Sussex day care licensed

By MARINA STRAUSS

The Ontario Government's Day Nurseries Branch issued an operating licence to the Sussex Street Campus-Community Co-operative Day Care Centre in mid-August, three and a half years after the Centre's original application.

Although the hearings for the licence request ended one and a half years ago, the government has taken that long to reach a decision.

The government's approval came only after the centre could boast a certifiable member of staff. The Day Nurseries Branch recognizes an early childhood education certificate or a childcare certificate from Mothercraft of Canada as qualifications.

Last spring one of the members of the centre's staff became "qualified" after she finished the Seneca College early childhood education course.

Interestingly enough, a revision last month in the Day Nurseries Act stipulates that both a hearing and a decision for a day care licence must take place within 90 days of the application. Previously no time limit was specified.

Day Nurseries Branch employee John Hayes said he could "reasonably speculate" that one factor in the Act's change was the lengthy negotiations with the university Co-op group.

The parent-controlled Co-op refuses to hire staff on the basis of certificates.

"We wanted to hire people with experience in our centre," said former Centre co-ordinator and parent Julie Mathien. The certified courses do not train people to work in a co-operative situation.

The Sussex Street Day Care Centre applied for a licence in September, 1969. After the University spent $12,000 to meet fire, health, and safety standards set down by the Day Nurseries Branch, the licence was formally denied in October, 1970. With minor physical repairs already completed on the 125 Sussex building, the only pitfall remaining was lack of qualified staff.

The licence does not cover the Co-op's other centre, for over-two year olds, which has been illegally occupying the Devonshire clubhouse behind the Meteorology Building at 315 Bloor Street West for 18 months. This centre is not eligible for a licence since it does not comply with fire marshal standards.

The parents of the licensed Sussex Day Care Centre are now eligible to obtain subsidies from the Ontario government.

"The criteria (for obtaining a subsidy) are pretty low," said Mathien. These subsidies cover operating expenses only, and not capital expenditures.

Mathien pointed out that in calculating eligibility for subsidies not more than $25 a month for debt payments can be deducted from the parents' monthly income. If the parents pay off $100 each month on a car loan, they would not be able to deduct more than $25 from their net monthly income for it, Mathien explained. Former university students paying off government loans are highly vulnerable to this regulation.

The four-year old Co-op Day Care Centre has faced struggles on every step of its development. In the spring of 1970 the university administration helped support the Sussex Centre only after a student sit-in forced then-president Claude Bissell to soften to student demands for day-care facilities.

Two years later, when the Co-op needed a second house for its over-two year olds, the administration again refused to lend an ear, which resulted in the occupation of the unused Devonshire clubhouse in April, 1972. The Co-op is now working with Innis College to find permanent accommodations.

What goes behind closed doors?

By PAUL McGRATH

The Eaton family has a wrinkle in their plans to turn downtown Toronto into Eatonland, and the University of Toronto is doing its best to smooth it out. The problem can be traced to a lady named Naomi Bilton, who carried a grudge against the Eatons to her deathbed, when she willed a very important property at 188 Yonge Street to the University of Toronto in 1922.

The University has little or no need for this small property far from University territory, and the Eatons are chomping at the bit to swallow the lonely Reitman's Store that stands there to use in Phase 2 of the mammoth Eaton Centre. The catch is contained in the working of the Bilton will.

The University received the land under the stipulation "that the same never be sold or leased to John C. Eaton or the T. Eaton Company or any person or firm in any way representing them, or to any person or corporation carrying on the business of a departmental store surrounding the property."

The clause was aimed at the company that during the twenties was swallowing up many small businesses in the area, and which now controls almost all of the property bounded by Yonge, Bay, Queen, and Dundas Streets. This little problem has had lawyers for both

U of T and Fairview Corporation (the firm looking after development of the Eaton Centre) working for a past couple of years looking for a loophole.

The University went to the Ontario Supreme Court about two years ago to contest the wording of the will, but it was upheld. One would assume that the university's hands were tied. Not true.

According to Jack Brook, Executive Assistant to Business Affairs Vice President Alex Rankin, Fairview is revising an offer for the property to be presented to the university late this week or early next week. Even after the refusal by the Supreme Court to change the will, university officials have been informed by their solicitors, Cassels Brock, that the sale is legal, and it appears that the university will accept the offer.

As to how this is possible, Business Affairs refuses to tip their hand. Brook declined to give The Varsity a copy of the letter containing the legal opinion of the prestigious law firm, nor would he disclose the price Fairview was offering. Keeping in mind that firms such as Cassels Brock don't get where they are by offering rash opinions, it must be assumed that the sale does not break the wording of the will.

Fairview, as a development company building for the Eaton Centre, does not necessarily have to represent the Eaton family or department store. The land collected and developed will belong to Fairview, not to the Eatons. Fairview is an independent company with no Eatons on the board of directors. Their money and influence comes from the Bronfman family, of Distillers Corp.-Seagrams and Camp Investments Ltd. which has been involved in the same sort of downtown-eating in Vancouver.

This, however, does not mean that the Bronfmans and Eatons aren't behind the conference table working out the deal.

Gus Abols, vice-chairman of the Executive Committee of the Governing Council theorized that it is possible for Fairview to buy the land without breaking the wording of the will provided they don't actually build any part of a department store on the property. This means they might build a parkette to lure shoppers in from the streets or a parking lot to accommodate shoppers driving from the suburbs without contravening the stipulations of the will.

The sale to Fairview of the former Bilton property does away with the last holdout in the area below Albert Street and will certainly take a load off the minds of both U of T and Fairview layers. Even when there's a will, there's a way.

This store wants to be part of Eaton Centre—won't YOU help?

No say for students in tenure decisions

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Students will have no say in faculty tenure decisions if recommendations released last week by a presidential task force are implemented.

The Task Force on Academic Appointments was formed last spring by U of T president John Evans to consider the question of academic appointments and tenure during the "steady state" of enrolment forecast for the next decade.

The eleven member task force, chaired by vice president and provost Don Forster, had two student members, chosen by Evans, one undergraduate and one graduate. Six members belonged to the teaching faculty.

The majority of the task force recommended that committees considering candidates for tenure include only teaching staff and senior administrators.

The task force claimed that it could not find a satisfactory way to select students of high enough calibre to make judgements on tenure. It also suggested that students would have serious conflicts of interest when it came to judging teaching ability. Some members of the task force felt that students lack the "necessary maturity of judgement", knowledge and commitment to be effective committee members.

Student task force member Debra Lewis was "very disappointed" with the task force stand on student participation. She suggested that the task force should have accepted student participation as a principle, rather than dismissing it as impractical. She found some members "a little bit too unwilling" to discuss the subject fully.

The report accepted the institution of tenure in its present form. Without elaborating, it stated that tenure was the "best method so far devised" to protect the "autonomous pursuit of knowledge". It rejected the abolition of tenure (which the SAC brief had recommended) as "naïve", and found that other alternatives to tenure would lower the quality of the university.

The task force dismissed the idea that tenure would lead to intellectual stagnation. However, to safeguard against this it did suggest a more generous early retirement scheme for faculty. It also suggested that vacant posts be widely advertised, to ensure the hiring of the best faculty.

The report also encouraged the hiring of more part-time teaching staff, and appointment of visiting staff, as alternatives to employing full time faculty when vacancies arose.

The task force outlined a standardization of the path to tenure. A faculty member would begin his career at the rank of assistant professor. Those without a doctorate would be hired at the level of lecturer, with annual contracts renewable for a maximum of six years.

An assistant professor would have an initial two year contract, followed by a renewal of up to three years.

After that time, the task force said, the candidate must be considered for tenure. It gave three years as the minimum period of service before consideration for tenure.

Those joining the university as associate professors would either be considered for tenure initially, or receive a three year contract. Those appointed at the level of professor would automatically be tenured.

The task force outlined three criteria for granting tenure. These were achievement in research, effectiveness in teaching, and promise of future development. A fourth, less important, consideration was community service.

The report deemed a teacher effective if he was stimulating and challenging, communicated well, and showed a mastery of his subject.

Although the task force acknowledged the "essential" role of students in assessing teaching ability, it again pleaded impracticability, and declined to spell out precisely how teaching ability should be evaluated. It suggested the possibility of polling graduates, conducting course questionnaires and soliciting letters from students.

The report noted that "dismissal for cause" was an important area of concern. Tenured staff are not exempt from dismissal, said the report. However, the task force claimed that dismissal for purely fiscal reasons "undermines the concept of tenure".

A majority of the task force accepted the fact that dismissal - even of tenured faculty - might have to occur in times of financial stress. It urged the university to find other means to prevent cutbacks. It suggested cutting back funds in non-academic and library budgets, or even across-the-board salary reductions.

A minority of the task force objected on principle to dismissal for fiscal reasons.

The task force proposed permanent tenure committees, which would evaluate on a division level. It rejected committees "tailor-made" for each case. (Tenure committees now exist under individual department chairmen.)

The report also suggested the formation of a University Tenure Committee, composed of the chairmen of all the division committees. The task force advocated "some student and lay representatives".

The task force also recommended to formation of a university committee to deal with promotions and faculty incentives. It did not mention student membership.

No kids wanted.

SAC President Bob Anderson criticized the Forster Report on Academic Appointments in a press release Monday.

The reports recommendations, Anderson said, guarantee exclusive faculty control over staffing procedures including hiring, firing, promotion and tenure decisions.

The majority of the Task Force did not oppose seating students on staffing committees, but no method for selecting students was suggested.

Therefore Anderson urged U of T President John Evans to set up a committee with staff-student parity to consider how students could be chosen for committees.

The Forster Report, Anderson also said, "pays lip service to the importance of teaching" in tenure decisions, but does not set up a method for evaluating teaching ability.

The task force has already had a somewhat unpopular history in its six months' existence.

Last January, Evans was criticized by members of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs Committee for unilaterally setting up the task force. The committee felt it should have jurisdiction over the matter of academic appointments.

In March, the Graduate Students' Union asked graduate student Byron Wall to resign from the task force, as it considered his method of selection by the administration as improper. GSU president Wendy Leblanc called student participation on the task force a "facade of democracy".

Residents of 4 Sussex St., beside the Roberts Library, found that moving into a U of T owned house can be risky. See PAGE 7.

Forster report vague on teaching

The Report of the Task Force to Review Policy and Procedures on Academic Appointments makes interesting reading if only for its humour. We find it extremely hard to believe that students will swallow the administration's line without some active opposition.

The task force, some of you may remember, was originally set up by President John Evans, and the members were his hand-picked choices. Of course, an analysis of the report leaves one with the impression that little has changed. Surprise.

Students at U of T should not be duped into thinking that the task force's report has any relationship to the improvement of the quality of teaching. The back-handed and seemingly reforming measures are nothing less than smokescreens to belie the report's real purpose — the imposition of some method of financial control by the provincial government over faculty in a time of "steady state" enrolment.

One has only to look at where the real recommendations lie to see that they have little to do with the quality of education a student at this university receives or will in future receive. Indeed, appointment power is still centred with vice-president and provost Don Forster, the number one-and-a-half man in the administration, or as a Varsity staffer referred to him two years ago, that "white line on a slushy administration road."

Provost Forster now has the real power — as opposed to the deceptive camouflage that the university would like the student body to overlook — and his report recommends that he keep that power. Naturally.

Of course, there are vague murmurings scattered throughout the report about student participation in the appointment process. But, it is just that — participation, not power, or even equality with the other estates of the university community.

We shouldn't be fooled either by the fact that the report appears to be liberal in its recommendation that the University Tenure Committee "shall include... some student and lay representatives", for the UTC (as it is affectionately known) only "reviews all tenure recommendations made during an academic year with a primary concern for the consistency of procedures and standards in the committees." A nice position for a student to hold for a year if he or she is trying for a Rhodes, but useless for little else.

But on to the real thrust of the Forster Report.

It's no secret John Evans is a university technocrat's dream, and one of Evans' main selling points when he was hired as president a year and a half ago was his ability to streamline procedures and keep university departments smoothly oiled. So, at a time of "steady state" enrolment and a possibility of cutbacks in university teaching salaries, hirings, and promotions who better to "toss out the old" and "ring in the new"?

In an interview two weeks ago Evans indicated to The Varsity which section of the report he considered more important; in fact, he used the word "prime" when discussing the obligation of the university to provide a smooth functioning apparatus between faculty and administration. Evans hastily tried to cover up when asked about the "quality of teaching", but we weren't left with the impression that he was serious. He's not an academic, after all, but a "technocrat".

However, we tend to believe that a significant number of students are concerned with what they are taught and how they are taught it. We also feel that students will be powerless without an equal share in the decision-making process on hiring, firing, and tenure committees. Anything less would not be worth fighting for, since students can't effectively determine their education from a position of weakness.

The Students Administrative Council appears to be owing towards adopting the position of tenure, but much too slowly. In a SAC brief to the Forster task force president Bob Anderson wrote "We regard parity between students and teaching staff as the eventual goal. However, we are prepared to proceed to that goal gradually, as experience demonstrates that students can function effectively on staffing committees."

One might compare Anderson's viewpoint on staffing committees to the Governing Council experience where students (now well below a parity position) have functioned effectively, but on the side of the administration. Many students now see their Governing Council members as the legitimate student representatives. We feel that SAC more properly fulfills that role. It's more detached from the administration and its members are less subject to co-optation by the administration. Or so we hope.

The SAC should also, we believe, consider proposing a system of parallel structures with respect to the tenure, staffing, and firing committees. This would enable each of the three major estates in the university — faculty, students, and administration — to decide their position on a certain faculty member among themselves. One could veto the combined decision of the other two. It might prove unworkable at first, but then "unworkability" is one of the excuses that the Forster task force report states for not placing students on the various committees in the first place.

Who best can make the judgments which the tenure decision requires?

President Evans might attempt to gain student backing for the section of the report in which he is most likely to receive a faculty inspired backlash — that pertaining to security, seniority, and advancement. That would be a good opportunity for students to take a united stand in favour of tenure or parallel structures. But a compromise less than parity is, we believe, unacceptable.

All too often we have seen the university administration tactically overwhelm any attempts at restructuring of the educational system on this campus. This time, if there appears to be a chance for real equality, our strategy should be sound, and we should be prepared to work for change.

Discipline code restricts students

By ART MOSES

The Code of Behaviour passed by the Governing Council in June is the latest in a long series of efforts by administrators and senior faculty to impose a restrictive discipline plan on U of T students.

The moves began during the height of student activism in the late 1960's. Faced with student demands for significant changes in university government and course content, administrators found themselves without legitimate disciplinary machinery for use if dissent got "out of hand".

All they had was the Caput — the supreme disciplinary body in the university — composed of all the deans of faculties and principals of colleges. It included no student or junior faculty representation and was therefore, utterly unacceptable for dealing with cases arising out of campus political disruptions.

Even former U of T president Claude Bissell agreed its decisions wouldn't command much support. So in March 1968 he wrote to the Student's Administrative Council asking for students to sit on a committee to consider "reform" of the university's discipline system. SAC named three students to what became known as the Campbell Committee, named after its chairman, Ralph Campbell, now principal of Scarborough College. The committee included equal numbers of students, faculty and administrators.

But the committee worked slowly, and the threat of student revolt was growing — at least in the minds of university administrators. In the spring of 1969 Bissell again wrote to SAC and asked for students to sit on another committee — this time to "reconstitute the Caput" as a more "representative body". The reconstituted Caput would give the university a disciplinary stick to use before the Campbell committee reported.

A wary SAC agreed to the committee, but during the summer of 1969 argued that the new Caput should not have jurisdiction over political disruptions. Other members of the committee to reconstitute agreed, but Claude Bissell was incensed.

His fellow university presidents and a campus leftist group blew the issue sky-high in the fall of 1969.

The Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario (CPUO) issued its notorious "working paper" called "Order on the Campus". The paper outlawed any "interference with the processes and activities essential to the functioning of the university community". Students caught in sit-ins were liable to expulsion and/or, lengthy jail terms. SAC demanded Bissell repudiate the paper but he merely said that it "was not policy at U of T".

Only days later, reacting to a series of disruptions of orientation speeches by the "New Left Caucus", the old unreconstituted Caput met and declared it would deal with future disruptions. Penalties would include expulsion. SAC was outraged that the university would undermine negotiations toward Caput reform by suddenly re-legitimizing the body. Student representatives withdrew from the committee to reconstitute the Caput and for a week the campus seemed in a state of war.

Bissell was let off the hook by the early publication (non-coincidental) of the Campbell report. He diffused student demands for repudiation of the CPUO and Caput statements by saying the Campbell report took precedence and would shape future U of T discipline policy.

The Campbell report was a reasonable document.

It contained two major concessions to student activism. First it recommended that "students and faculty reach operational agreement in the classroom" about course content and teaching methods before courses begin. The procedure would have undermined the unquestioned supremacy of faculty members over students in the classroom. The second was a recognition that "non-violent obstructive demonstrations can be justified" and that negotiations should be directed as much to their cause as to their termination.

Both ideas were anathema to senior faculty members who were then girding for their successful battle against the reform-minded report of the Commission on University Government. A committee was established to consider implementation of the Campbell report and the faculty representatives refused to countenance these two sections. They were quite willing to give students equal representation with faculty on discipline bodies, but weren't prepared to allow students any corresponding power over decisions which might give rise to disciplinary problems.

Students rejected this hollow "reform", and disciplinary change was effectively blocked with both sides stalemated for two years. The Caput was never reconstituted; the Campbell Report faded into oblivion.

What broke the stalemate was the creation of the new Governing Council in July 1972, which included token student representation.

When the powers-that-be decided that "student representative" Paul Cadario could be chairman of the powerful Internal Affairs Committee, in July '72, they knew he could be depended upon to guide through an acceptable discipline code. And guide it through he did.

In the past the university had only the Board of Governors to approve a discipline code and both faculty and students wanted the unrepresentative board replaced. With the new Governing Council the university could claim that students were fully represented when the document designed to keep them in their place was approved.

Cadario refused to consider delaying passage of the code until September to give students a chance to react. He insisted on passing it in June. It should be noted that every other student on the governing council voted against immediate passage.

In the much less turbulent campus atmosphere of 1973 the hard-line tone of the Code of Behavior seems almost laughable.

Day Care still fighting for permanent home

By MARINA STRAUSS

The Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre on Devonshire Place is continuing its two-year struggle to secure permanent accommodation for its 25 children over two years old as the university administration puts pressure on the group to move from the clubhouse it has illegally occupied for 18 months.

The university needs the Devonshire Place clubhouse to set up its own administration—controlled day care centre, which the Governing Council decided to establish last September. The university had hoped to open its centre by September 1.

The U of T is now anxious to move the Co-op to temporary quarters so that renovations to the building can get under way. Workers have already entered the clubhouse to take measurements.

The parent-run Co-op took over the unused Devonshire clubhouse behind the Bloor Street West Meteorology Building 18 months ago. The Co-op needed more space for its over two charges, and the university had stalled for many months in helping them find new quarters.

Inn-Res, the Innis College residence co-operative, agreed last December to accommodate the Day Care Co-op's two centres at 12 and 14 Sussex Street. The Co-op has already been settled for four years at 12 Sussex, which now houses children under two years of age.

But the Day Care Co-op is not prepared to move to temporary accommodations or to move into 14 Sussex before renovations to it are completed. On August 13 the Co-op turned down a Students' Administrative Council loan of up to $25,000 to Inn-Res to cover minimum renovations to the house to meet fire marshal standards.

"With the loan from SAC, we wouldn't be able to make any structural or architectural changes in the building", explained Co-op co-ordinator and former student Nick Powers.

"The building is just a horizontal set-up, not suitable for under-twins. There's no backyard."

"A temporary move," Powers said, "would be too hard on the children."

Inn-Res is in the midst of drawing up final plans for renovations for its new residences on Sussex Street, including 12 and 14. It is awaiting cost estimations, after which it will apply to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) for a loan.

Powers said that if they moved immediately into 14 Sussex, they might have to wait as long as six months for the Inn-Res-CMHC loan to come through before they could complete renovations.

In addition, Powers said, the Co-op could not afford to pay off two loans at the same time—one to SAC and one to CMHC.

"We're hoping to stay in Devonshire until they (the administration) make another offer or until the CMHC money comes through", Powers said.

Asked what her response was to the Co-op's refusal to move temporarily, Campus Co-ordinator Lois Reimer replied "I would hope that it is not an irrevocable position. I would still hope some other arrangement could be made if needed."

Powers stressed that it is not just a question of when the Day Care Co-op will move to 14 Sussex. The Co-op is not sure it will be able to afford its share of the payments, and is now waiting for cost estimations.

If the Day Care Co-op can not afford to move into Innis' facilities, "it may be that a new alternative may have to be sought", Reimer said.

The Co-op has been negotiating with Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway during most of the summer.

"She's committed to getting us a permanent place", Powers admitted. He called the Devonshire clubhouse "the perfect building" for the Co-op's centre but we agreed last December to work with Innis'.

"We've been working with the (university) administration step by step", Powers said. "We are bargaining for permanent space."

In September, 1972, the Governing Council responded to increased pressure for day care on the campus with its decision to establish a single administration—controlled day care centre in the Devonshire clubhouse, with fees twice those of the Co-op centre. Parents of the 86 children in the three campus day care centres now in existence—St. Andrew's and the two Campus Co-op centres—will have first priority for the new university centre's 50 places.

But the Co-op had been pushing for two university centres to accommodate the sharply conflicting day care philosophies of the different centres. Co-op parents work in and have full control of their centres, while at St. Andrew's, parents control the centre indirectly through an advisory board.

The St. Andrew's University Day Nursery, now housed in the Bloor Street East St. Andrew's church, has been facing a demolition order for the past four years, and will soon be seeking new accommodations as well. The day care centre has operated for five years in the church.

"We're tending to look more towards the church to help us rather than towards the university", St. Andrew's director Elody Scholz said. The church pay the group's $750 monthly rent, whereas the university has discontinued its financial support to St. Andrew's.

The group will probably be able to stay in the church until next summer, Scholz predicted.

Both the St. Andrew's and Co-op centres have children of the community as well as of the university. The new university day care centre plan excludes anyone not connected to the university.

Textbooks $2.25 a lb?

By KEN CLARK

Going to school will cost more this year. Aside from the usual cost of tuition and the increasing cost of food, a quick Varsity survey reveals the following:

- Accommodation will cost more. On the average, residence fees at the colleges have been raised $20 to $25 for the session. Exceptions are Trinity College which raised fees $100 and the Married Students Residence which did not raise rents at all.

- The University of Toronto Housing Service did not yet have exact statistics available on how much more it will cost this year to live in the campus area. However, the centre's personnel have noticed a large number of rent increases among landlords relisting their accommodation.

- Books will cost more. At the textbook store it was estimated that publishers are raising their prices by about five per cent. The American currency problems are reducing the markup on books imported from the U.S., but British books will cost substantially more because of the relative values of the pound and Canadian dollar.

- Hart House fees stayed at $30.
- U of T HEALTH Service fees went from $10 to $12.

The question at once arises whether students' summer earnings rose to keep pace with costs. A look at data provided by the U of T Placement Centre showed that engineering students earned about $5 per week more this summer than last—about $75 more over the whole summer.

Farmworkers reactivate boycott

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

Major outbursts of violence on United Farmworker picket lines in California have led UFW organizers to call off the strike, and to send 570 farmworkers to 63 North American cities to spearhead a renewed grape and lettuce boycott against supermarket chains.

Since the UFW struck July 29, 1973, two union members have been murdered, nine others injured in bursts of gunfire, and hundreds beaten and hospitalized. Inequities in the administration of the law have been common. Over 5,000 workers were arrested for breaking an injunction restricting the use of a bullhorn to one hour a day, and allowing only one picket every 100 feet. In Fresno County, while 800 farmworkers and clergymen were being held in jail on $1,550 bail, a grower who tried to run over some picketers with a truck was freed on his own recognizance. The district attorney in Kern County reduced charges against Teamster strike-breakers varying from a felony — assault with a deadly weapon, to a misdemeanor — disturbing the peace.

Last Friday, 31 UFW members arrived in Toronto, including noted boycott leaders Marshall and Jessica Ganz, and were welcomed by over 100 people at the Bathurst Street, United Church. UFW organizer, Lupe Gamboa, sent ahead a month ago to prepare for the farmworkers' arrival, asked for support from the Toronto community. Yesterday Ganz met with SAC members and U of T students to begin an information campaign and boycott committee on the campus.

Ganz explained that strikes began when grape growers signed "sweetheart contracts" with the Teamsters. The UFW had held three year contracts with growers, now after a lengthy boycott.

These "sweetheart contracts" effectively exclude the UFW from bargaining procedures. UFW organizers claim these "back-door deals" deny farm-workers their choice of union by election, and bring back the hated labour-contractor system of hiring, in which a middle man takes a 10-20 per cent cut from the workers' wages. They would also result in lower wages for farmworkers, the UFW argues, remove pesticide protection previously won by the UFW, and destroy the workers' medical plan.

Other benefits won by the UFW in their contracts include a child labour ban, rest breaks, a limit on hours of work, toilet and cool drinking water in the fields, protective garments, seniority and job security, and the right to have an elected ranch committee enforce the contracts.

"We have fought for these basic necessities, and we are in danger of losing them," continued Jessica Ganz. "People have suffered long enough. People have sacrificed long enough. And the people will get the contracts," she said.

In a special Farmworker's Issue of the International Teamster's Magazine, (March 1973) the Teamsters claim they can better represent the farmworkers than the "activist troublemakers (who are) confusing the buying public by promoting boycotts of union-grown and harvested crops". These activists are using the farmworkers as pawns, claim the Teamsters, because only the Teamsters with their greater power, strength and status can win these rights for the farmworkers.

Incidentally, this same issue also features a letter to Frank Fitzsimmons, general president of the Teamsters, from Richard Nixon, thanking the Teamsters for "following their conscience and supporting our men in Vietnam and our Nation's commitment." Another interesting political connection of the Teamsters is discussed in a Los Angeles Times article, (June 1, 1973) entitled Nixon, the Teamsters and the Mafia, which revealed that 40 days of FBI wiretapping exposed a Mafia plan to use $8 million in Teamster welfare funds.

AFL-CIO president George Meany in an August news conference described the action of the Teamsters as being "just about the worst thing that has happened in my lifetime from a trade union point of view." The AFL-CIO has pledged $1.6 million to the UFW in their present fight, in addition to $2.5 million which was given in the first five years of the struggle.

Since the three years of successful union contracts between the UFW and the growers ran out last July, the seesaw for new contracts has swung between the UFW and the Teamsters.

August 9, the Teamsters signed contracts with 30 Delano area growers, through agent James Smith.

The Delano growers control 40 per cent of the entire grape harvest. The following day, Cesar Chavez walked out of the Teamsters' Western Conference negotiating session, declaring that since the Teamsters had already signed contracts with the growers the teamsters were not in a position to negotiate with the UFW grape harvesters.

The same day, August 10, William Grami, Director of Organizing for the Western Conference, immediately repudiated the Teamster contracts, saying Smith had acted contrary to directives from headquarters. Einar Mohn, Director of the Western Conference, and Frank Fitzsimmons, also declared their opposition to these contracts in a statement from Washington, D.C. The growers, however, are still trying to hold the Teamsters to their contracts, because of their interest in breaking the UFW.

The UFW is also seeking to represent lettuce workers who have been threatened by Teamster takeover. Nearly 200 lettuce contracts were signed in July, 1970, between the Teamsters and lettuce growers in California's Salinas, Santa Maria, and Imperial Valleys. However, Teamster Einar Mohn announced in a Los Angeles Times interview in April, "I do believe it will be a couple of years before farmworkers will be able to take any real part in membership meetings."

Lettuce workers now fear exclusion from all decision-making under the Teamsters. Consequently, Chavez led about 6,000 workers in a strike in Salinas Valley on August 24, 1970. As a result, three lettuce growers in Salinas D'Arrigo Brothers, Freshpick (Purex), and Interharvest (United Fruit) cancelled their Teamster contracts, held elections for their workers, and signed new contracts with the UFW. The failure of the growers to uphold these led to the continuation of the present lettuce boycott.

A major issue is the lack of legal protection for American agricultural workers. Marc Zwelling, author of The Strikebreakers explained that this is not only an American problem since farmworkers are not covered in Canadian labour legislation. Sugar beet farmers in Alberta have encountered difficulties attempting to unionize. In fact, the definition of farmworker is often stretched to deny workers collective bargaining rights.

One such example occurred in Ontario, in 1969, where Cedarvale Nursery Workers tried to organize a union. Michael J. Riley, Administrator of Local 183, Labourers International Union, reported that 40 or 50 workers were affected. When the case was brought to Ontario Labour Relations Board, the judge ruled that since some of the duties could be considered agricultural, the workers could not have a union.

Farmworkers are generally migrant labourers receiving extremely low wages, and very few benefits. California is in the midst of a class struggle. The wealthy growers, powerful Teamsters, giant supermarket corporations, and the forces of law and order are in collusion on one side. Opposing them is the grass-roots UFW, with AFL-CIO financial backing, active support from the National Council of Churches, and the pivotal boycott committees in major urban centres.

Canadian consumers of grapes and lettuce are also complicit in the oppressive treatment of Californian workers. An average farmworker earns an income of $2,500 a year ($1,307 in 1968). One quarter of all farmworkers are children since the low wages paid to the family breadwinner are not sufficient to meet minimum family expenses.

Average per capita health care expenditures by insurance plans for migrant farmworkers is $7.50 compared with a $200 average for the rest of the population. The Salud Medical Clinic in California's Tulare County found in a recent study that 774 farm-workers suffered pesticide poisoning symptoms, and a nutritional study in the same county detected pesticide poisoning symptoms in almost 50 per cent of the farm-workers, children excluded.

Death rates of migrant farm workers as a percentage of the national rates in 1967, reveal that infant mortality is 125 per cent higher than the national rate; death from influenza and pneumonia, 200 per cent; death from tuberculosis and other infectious diseases, 260 per cent and death from accidents, 300 per cent.

The neglected needs of the farmworkers, the majority of Chicanos, have been recognized in the 1969 report of the Senate Subcommittee, on Migratory Labor which states:

"Migrant workers and their families have been excluded or at best, minimally included, in all conventional citizen worker benefits enacted by Federal and state law, such as unemployment insurance, workmens compensation coverage, social security insurance, general welfare assistance, minimum age standards, and child labor protections."

U of T-owned house no security guarantee

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Six U of T students will be more cautious the next time they rent rooms or flats in the area around the university — even if the house is owned by U of T.

The students say a middleman who rented out rooms and flats at U of T-owned 4 Sussex Street, knew that the students wanted to stay all year when they moved in last month, but also knew that the university wanted the building vacated by November.

For Geraldine Rodman, the middleman, it was a choice of whether to be stuck for three months with an empty house, or to neglect telling the students that they could only stay until the end of October. She chose not to tell the students.

One of the students, Susan Blum, told The Varsity that they "certainly" told Rodman they intended to stay the whole school year. Rodman's only response was that since there was no lease, only one month's notice was required for eviction.

Rodman denies that the students told her they wanted to stay all year. She says she made it clear that rental was on a "one month basis".

"I think I gave them adequate warning," she commented. "Nobody in his right mind would rent a place in this area and expect it to be secure."

Rodman rents the house from Crown Trust which manages the property for U of T. She pays Crown Trust $250 a month, but takes in $655 a month in rent from four rooms and two flats. Since she has few expenses—Crown pays taxes and maintenance—her profit amounts to at least 80 per cent.

She said she refused to "take a loss" by letting the house go vacant for three months.

Early in the summer, Rodman was notified by Crown Trust that U of T wanted the house vacated by November 1. The house is to be used as part of the new Innis College building after it is renovated.

Blum said that when the tenants discussed the possibility of renovating the house with their own money, Rodman had no objection. Rodman told The Varsity that it was all right with her if they wanted to make the place more liveable, but they understood that they were living there on a one month basis."

R. M. Grimes, an administrative assistant in the office of the Vice-President (Business Affairs) stated that it was Rodman's responsibility to tell the tenants they couldn't stay all year, since she was given adequate notification.

Blum said the tenants have "checked out completely" the possibility of legal action, but said Rodman's actions are within the law since only one month's notice is required.

Rodman remarked that it was "too bad" the tenants had to leave, but added that it was "no one's fault."

"Use my name carefully," she warned The Varsity. "I've got a lawyer working on this."

Students have to contend with high rents and instability in the university area, and matters are not helped much when some of U of T's 95 to 90 houses are rented out through middlemen. The situation will be improved when a few U of T-owned houses on Sussex are taken over later this year by Innis Residence Co-op.

Grimes says the university is glad to have Inn-Res step in and take over renting the university properties.

Rodmans advice to students is to either sign a lease or pressure the university to take over the houses and rent them to students for the whole school year.

Library struggle united students, community

Undergraduate access to the stacks of the new $42 million John P. Roberts Library is a result of a four month campaign in 1972 by members of the university community, including faculty, graduate and undergraduate students. The "universal access issue", as it became known during the library "struggle" from January to March of 1972, was also supported by extra-university organizations such as the Waffle and the Toronto Labour Council.

Prior to the push for universal stack access, the Library Council together with the U of T administration had decided that because the Roberts library was chiefly designed with the graduate student in mind, stack access should be restricted to graduates. In setting this policy, the U of T brought upon itself the opposition of one of the most widely supported movements to date on campus.

Students occupied the Senate chamber three times, and the stacks of the Sigmund Samuel Library once; both Metro and campus police occupied the Senate chamber to evict students. This marked the second time within eight months that acting-president Jack Sword had ordered outside police on to campus. The previous summer Metro police arrived without warning to evict a summer tent city, Wacheea, from the Hart House Circle common.

The movement for universal stack access began in January 1972 with a referendum campaign run through The Varsity (coupons of support for the open stacks proposal clipped from and sent to the newspaper were presented to the Library Council), and a motion by the Students' Administrative Council that undergraduates continue to have the right of stack access.

Library council member and SAC rep. David Warren (UC IV) said at the time that stack access was "a simple question of equity. Undergraduates rely on the library as much as graduates."

As an indication of the hardship that undergraduates would face if stack access were denied, Warren cited a Library Council study which indicated that students examine four books for every one that they take out. The council report also noted a rise in undergraduate loans during the previous few years, and, ironically, during the 1970-71 academic year alone, undergraduate loans had exceeded graduate loans by 6.5 per cent for the first time.

During January 1972 students made a concerted effort to organize against the impending Library Council decision of whether or not to close the stacks of the Robarts to undergraduates. Graduate Students' Union president Stephen Kogitz issued a statement strongly endorsing equal stack access, and the Political Economy Course Union organized a petition campaign against closed stacks. The St. Michael's College Student Union issued an open letter to the library council, which read in part: "This policy is directly obstructive to the pursuance of a meaningful education...it constitutes a continuance of an artificial division between graduate and undergraduate students in access of university resources".

Obviously upset over the campaign to open the Roberts' stacks to undergraduates, library officials stepped up their efforts to survey library usage at the existing facilities (chiefly the Sigmund Samuel Library). In late January the library workers began circulating questionnaires to students using "Sig Sam" to discover why students came to the library, their opinions of the services there, and their habits on using the library. (Students in second, third and fourth years of an undergraduate program had access to the Sig Sam stacks.) However, at no time did library personnel solicit student opinion on whether the Roberts should have open stacks. Library workers were even forbidden by an official library memo to discuss the matter with questioning students.

As expected, on February 2 the Library Council composed of 18 administrators and 6 students voted by a margin of 19-5 to close the stacks of the Roberts to undergraduates. In making its decision the council disregarded petitions signed by over 4,000 students and The Varsity coupon endorsed by a similar number. Library Council member R.L. Ruderman gave one indication of the council's feeling, arguing that theft or misfiling, deliberate or intentional, would be crucial problems if undergraduates were allowed into the stacks.

Anticipating student dissatisfaction with the Library Council's vote, the U of T administration increased campus security arrangements.

Unfortunately for the administration the Library Council's failure to recommend undergraduate stack access only resulted in increased student pressure to procure full library privileges not only for undergraduates, but also for the general public. The thrust of the students' campaign was directed at the Senate meeting of March 10, since the Senate — the highest academic governing body at the university — had the right to ratify or overturn the Library Council's decision.

Besides reorganizing another petition campaign, a student government-formed Library Action Steering Committee seized upon the idea of an Open Stacks Party in the Sigmund Samuel Library to publicize the movement's demands. The state party, scheduled for February 9, included speakers, music and food in the Sig Sam lobby and smoking room, with the sit-in gradually spreading to the circulation area and, in some cases, even the library stacks. The university administration deployed much of the campus police force to the library during the student occupation of the building, with a contingent of police even secreted away in a lower story, "Library Staff Only" room. Students attempting to enter the building after midnight on the evening of the sit-in found themselves locked out, until the embarrassed police found themselves confronted by a CBC television crew.

Ironically, faculty members who consistently opposed any student power demands were beginning to come out in support of universal stack access, apparently realizing the academic necessity of entrance to the stacks. History professor W.H. Nelson denounced the exclusion of undergraduates, saying "It is invidious and insensitive not to have undergraduate access to the stacks. If there are limits, they must be placed on all," he said. Nelson described the Roberts as "a monstrous triangular pile, based on the aspirations of former U of T president Claude Bissell and former Graduate School dean Ernest Sirluck".

School librarian Robert H. Blackburn felt that "undergraduates are as honest as other students, but have more temptation and less interest in the continuity of the university." Consequently, the danger of books being "stolen, mutilated, or misshelved increases in direct relation to the amount of traffic". Architecture student Dave Thom replied that the Roberts' was built like a "fortress" and that the best library security system in North America should ensure that more people are let in "because it will be practically impossible to steal a book."

Following the Open Stacks Party, students met at Convocation Hall February 11 to rally support for the open stacks effort. Although Blackburn refused to attend the meeting, chief librarian Henry Campbell of the Toronto Public Library System attended as the keynote speaker, coming out in favour of complete community access to the 14-floor library.

Once again the administration set up a committee to "study further" the concept of stack access to the new library. Chaired by English professor Peter Heyworth, and with students and their supporters in the minority, the universal stack access movement was doomed at the committee stage.

In late February, 10 days before the meeting to ratify the Library of The University of Toronto, Doug Wright, then deputy director of the Ontario Library Development in the Ontario Library Association, challenged the $50 fee charged by the U of T library borrowing agency.

In an interview Wright said to accept the concept of community libraries would require the need for more government subsidies to ensure they serve the needs of the community. "McMaster University Library regulations," he said, "and it's not just McMaster, but do Princeton and Yale and Harvard. There are very few that have

On Friday, March 11, the Senate approved "in principle" a different degree of access to the Library stacks by different users. About 250 students who attended the Senate meeting. Summer Medical Sciences Building. While some students, approximately 35-50, were in the Senate chamber during the meeting and the negative decision, a smaller group was job by a and non-students who were in the hall.

Following the occurrence of the riot, an ad hoc group of administrators and academics met for a meeting on Saturday morning to discuss the problem and find a way to end the riot. However, it was difficult for either side to negotiate. The students nor administration officials. The administration stated that "They will not condone the self-inflicted violence in order to impose self-order on the campus." Consideration by responsible bodies was completely unnecessary. A small group of students later met for a confrontation, and positions were made clear.

Negotiations failed, and the administration used another tactic on the following day, March 12. 54 students were taken out and arrested, 18 of whom were occupying the administration building. The weekend to protest the unequal stack access was disrupted by a mid-morning raid by police. President Jack Swarthmore said in a press conference a few months later that he had been told that the charges were unfounded. However, the administration. However, student demands for ending the sit-in now included a public statement by Sword that no warning was given in the Sunday raid, a commitment from the university to pay any court costs resulting from the Sunday raid, and that a Senate meeting be held three days later to ratify Sword's decision on stack access. But, the new demands were not met, with many of the occupying students feeling that they had already accomplished the goal of universal stack access.

Whereas the organized, well-planned campaign to open the stacks had gained considerable sympathy for students, the sit-in and evacuation of the Senate chamber cost students support both from within the university and also from the surrounding community. Some faculty members had signed a petition circulated by history professor Ken McNaught condemning U of T students for Monday's occupation and calling for the Senate to turn down acting president Jack Sword's proposals.

When the Senate met March 17 to decide whether or not to approve Sword's actions, the faculty was deeply divided. In an unusual reversal of loyalties, faculty who had consistently opposed student demands in the past, now were rallying forces against the administration, while more "liberal" faculty members were now pledging their support for it.

McNaught's petition received about 200
signatures, and an emergency meeting of the U of T Faculty Association urged the Senate to reject Sword's proposals. Some wanted to postpone any decision-making indefinitely, leaving it instead to the new Governing Council which was to take office on July 1, 1973; others were strongly opposed to the conditions under which the decision was made.

On March 20 the Senate refused to accept the "Sword compromise" by a vote of 83-58. Although the issue of open stack access was once again referred to the Library Council, it was to come back to the Senate by April 14.

In defeating Sword's proposals, the Senate argued that the Executive Committee had been merely "presented" with Sword's proposals and asked to "pass them on" without comment to the Senate. Apparently, the Senate also interpreted this action to mean that the Sword proposals were indicated to be merely passed on without having the official backing of the Executive Committee. This Trials involving four persons arrested in the March 1972 occupation of Simcoe Hall were completed last March with the conditional discharge of occupier Tom McLaughlin. McLaughlin had been charged with obstructing police during the evacuation of the Senate chamber. His trial, which began in March 1972, dragged on for more than a year.

Others charged with assaulting police during the evacuation were Gill Getty, Mark Goldblatt, and Randi Reynolds. Goldblatt, like McLaughlin, was also charged with obstructing police. Both Goldblatt and Reynolds were found guilty by Judge Charles Drukarsh, but were freed with "absolute discharge" and no criminal record. Also, Goldblatt was found not guilty of obstruction by Drukarsh who stated the accused didn't know what he was doing at the time. Getty was acquitted because there was "reasonable doubt" that he had assaulted police since he could not be identified.

Getty, Goldblatt, McLaughlin, and Reynolds were also charged along with 14 occupiers, with trespassing, but the charges were later dropped by an embarrassed U of T administration.

Evidence given during the trials of the four occupiers was obscured by inconsistencies on the part of U of T administrators and police. Metro police were called onto campus by president Jack Sword to aid the U of T police in evicting students from the Senate chambers.

Chief Security Officer Gordon W. Huff, testifying at Reynolds' and Goldblatt's trial said of the police eviction: "They had a duty. People were resisting, and police had to use a little force to get them out."
Huff argued that no excessive force was used.

He said he understood campus security and safety officer Jim Westhead's instructions to mean that "people who didn't leave were to be assumed trespassers". However, this contradicted Sword's interpretation of the events. Sword initially had given Westhead the evacuation orders. Apparently Westhead had then relayed these orders to Huff.

No police photographs of people being dragged out of the building during the round-up were submitted as evidence by the prosecution. However they were later introduced as a result of pressure from the defence. These photographs tended to confirm evidence of police violence, but some did not picture the action, only the faces of students.

The defence, on the other hand, used photographs taken by Varsity photographer Frank Rooney, which showed police manhandling students, pulling their hair, and throwing them bodily out of the building.

Scene outside Simcoe Hall after Metro Police broke up first occupation over library.

measure not only lessened the pressure on the Senate to accept the proposals, but was probably a broad hint that the administration did not want the Senate to accept them.

An additional indication of Sword's intentions came when he agreed with a statement by an executive member that it would not be a vote of non-confidence in the acting president if the Senate turned down the proposals the administration had endorsed. (The reason Sword — and the other administrators he had consulted at the time — gave for not asking the Executive Committee to endorse the proposals was it would make it more difficult for the Senate to have the free and open debate which the administration felt the proposals deserved.)

Although the administration applied the face saving gesture through the Senate, students had, in fact, wrung concessions on stack access from the Library Council. In late March, 1972, it appeared that students and faculty would be treated equally, with respect to library privileges (previously faculty had been more privileged) although special application for stack access based on need would be necessary.

A Senate meeting March 13 passed the issue of stack access on to the Library Council, which in turn sent it back for study to the Heyworth Committee. However, at the end of the 1971-72 academic year it was generally felt that there would be no differentiation according to rank, although university members would be required to show their individual academic needs for library use. However, public stack access was not a consideration of the committee and is still not before the Governing Council.

Trials exposed Police , Administration

After breaking through barricaded doors inside the Senate chamber one young uniformed policeman, his cap and badge number missing, punched and kicked wildly in all directions. Varsity reported Bob Bettson was jumped on and kneed and later treated in hospital for internal injuries and bruises. When asked for his badge number by former Varsity co-editor Tom Walkom, the officer punched Walkom in the face, knocking off his glasses, and kneed him in the stomach. Then, as Walkom and Bettson continued to request the officer's identity, they were grabbed by three other policemen and handcuffed together.

Contradictory testimony was also given by Sword, Westhead, and Inspector David Sproule of the 52nd precinct of Metro police. Westhead disagreed with Sword's assertions that he authorized police to evacuate Simcoe Hall with the understanding that charges of trespassing would not be laid against occupiers. According to Westhead, when Sword phoned his orders for the evacuation he made no mention of trespass, but gave no explicit instructions that demonstrators not be charged.

Instead, Sword instructed that police were to enter Simcoe Hall, order the demonstrators to leave, allow a short period for voluntary evacuation, and then remove those who remained, arresting resisters, according to Westhead. He testified that he interpreted these instructions to mean that all occupiers removed by police from the Senate chamber should be charged with trespass.

Like Huff, Westhead said that police were "restraining" a few of the occupiers, but that he saw no signs of violence. When shown photographs of police manhandling demonstrators, Westhead became vague and said that he saw little violence.

Sproule stated he led the city police in their actions during the evacuation. He said he was told that students were trespassing, that they be given a chance to leave voluntarily, and if they remained in Simcoe Hall they were to be removed forcibly if necessary, and arrested. Sproule emphasized that Westhead was clear in his request that the occupiers be charged with trespass, and added that he didn't hear the warning allegedly given to the occupiers by Huff.

Apparently there was considerable uncertainty as to Sword's exact words about the evacuation of the occupiers from Simcoe Hall. Theresa Falcioni, a university employee describing herself as a communications secretary, stated that her notes of what Sword said were: "Go ahead in five minutes" around 11 o'clock; no individual arrests; only those who resist should be arrested". However, U of T policewoman Joanne Pug said her record of the conversation also contained the statement: "Advise them that they are trespassing."

Judge Drukarsh rejected Sword's testimony, saying: "I am not impressed with his manner of giving it, or the evidence he gave." No matter what Sword "thinks he said, I find as a matter of fact he did say they were trespassing", Drukarsh concluded.

In a separate trial, Bill Getty said he had been "harrassed" by police detective Arthur Lymer. He said Lymer had called him and offered to make a deal with the condition that Getty would be cleared if he agreed to plead guilty. Lymer also reportedly said that if Getty followed his plan to plead not guilty, he might be "sent to jail". In reply to the statements Lymer admitted to having made a phone call to Getty to discuss the case, but denied he had made any mention of jail. Crown Attorney William Donaldson said "plea-bargaining" is an accepted practice. "A plea of guilty is indicative of penitence," he added.

In presenting his own defence McLaughlin attempted to define what he believed were the real issues: the university's elitism, its identification of property belonging to the public as its own, and the question of limits of protest. Nevertheless, McLaughlin was found guilty February 9, 1973, of obstruction police. He was then handcuffed and thrown in jail, but released six days later on his own recognizance to await sentence.

Judge MJ Cloney accused McLaughlin of "depriving others of their rights" and "wanting to make trouble." He said, "It's easy for someone who wants to make trouble to abuse our system."
Cloney then described various witnesses' evidence as "a hodge-podge of nonsense" and "purely make-up evidence." He also believed there was "fabrication" of information, although not amounting to perjury.

Last March McLaughlin was given a conditional discharge on his conviction of obstruction police during the break-up of the Simcoe Hall occupation. This means that if his record is still clear next March, he'll have no criminal charges pending. In the meantime, he must visit a probation officer once a month, not associate with people the officer considers "undesirable", and remain within the court's jurisdiction (Ontario), except with special permission from his probation officer.

Citizen groups want developers investigated

Delegates from both the Quebec-Gothic and South St. James Town Tenants Associations appeared at Attorney-General Dalton Bales' office last Friday. Their aim is to bring three developers—Meridian, Cadillac, and Greenwin—before the Royal Commission on violence in the building industry which began hearings Monday.

The two groups are placing their hopes in the expanded terms of reference of the royal commission. Originally, it was to deal with criminal activity in the plastering, lathing, and drywall industry in Metro, but it now has power to investigate such other areas as the commission may deem necessary.

The charges of violence mostly refer to evictions by Meridian, in the area south of St. James Town, where Meridian has been ousting tenants and tearing down buildings for four years. In the Quebec-Gothic area, according to Gothic Tenants spokesman Bruce Bunting, the violence by Greenwin and Cadillac has been 'more psychological than physical.' However, a pattern of evictions has been emerging lately which has led Quebec-Gothic residents to fear that Meridian-style tactics would be used on them.

In recent weeks, nine eviction notices have been received. All tenants were to have been out by August 30. The occupants of one house were subpoenaed to show reason why the Sheriff should not proceed to evict. The case is still in the courts. In addition, 22 houses on the two streets already vacant have not been re-rented.

The developers claim that the current evictions are for renovations. Bruce Bunting claims, however, that many of the 22 houses already vacant are in good shape and that those being evicted now could be relocated in them.

In a meeting between tenants and developers two weeks ago, Cadillac and Greenwin refused to withdraw the eviction notices. A second meeting will take place in about a week.

The tenants are seeking to have the developer rent or sell the now-vacant dwellings. Those in the nine houses which received eviction orders do not plan to vacate. In the words of Elizabeth Eayrs, alderman in Ward One where Quebec-Gothic is located, it is "socially reprehensible at a time of crisis in housing to leave 30 houses vacant." She also called the developers' activities "a form of blockbusting".

Eayrs feared, however, that the action of some tenants in going to Bales may have been bad tactically, since it lumps Greenwin and Cadillac together with Meridian. "The developer is now in the position that he can claim that the tenants are trouble-makers," she said.

Meanwhile the developers have re-applied for re-zoning which would allow them to build. On February 16 of this year, City Council voted to repeal the initial bylaw, of 1971, which re-zoned the streets for development. However, the Ontario Municipal Board, subsequent to City Council's decision, ruled that it would accept a modified version of the original application.

Loaners: prepare for hassles

If you're a part-time student, there's money waiting for you from Bill Davis' Big Blue Machine, but be prepared to face the usual government mixture of delays and poor planning.

The Ontario Ministry of Colleges and Universities first announced its intentions to make loan assistance available to part-time students in April, 1973. But the U of T Association of Part-time Undergraduate Students (APUS) and the Division of Extension said that they did not receive any information flyers or application forms until September 10, two days before classes started. Loan approval forms which students must present at the bank to obtain the loans, are still at the printer, according to a government employee.

Loan assistance is limited to students registered in degree or diploma programs.

Unlike loans for full-time students on which interest is charged only after study is completed, under the plan for part-time students, interest is calculated from the date the loan is negotiated, and loans are repayable when each credit course is finished. The interest rate is 10 per cent a year.

In a letter to U of T Vice President J.H. Sword, Acting Director of Extension E.M. Gruetznier termed the plan "ill-designed, ill-timed, and having little relationship to the financial need of adult students".

Gruetznier pointed out that over 42 per cent of U of T's adult students earn less than $8,000 a year, and the typical student has two children. "It is unlikely that an interest rate of 10 per cent and the proposed repayment schedule will alleviate the financial need of these students".

The APUS office has reported a great deal of confusion at the student Awards Office and APUS. Since no official word came from the government about the part-time assistance program over the summer, students were being told there was no program in existence.

Because of government delays, there was no time for either APUS of the Division of Extension to get together a worthwhile advertising campaign for the loan plan.

No formal report or research was done on part-time student needs, nor were university extension departments consulted before the loan plan was implemented, an official told The Varsity.

Report of New Program committee ready this week

By PAUL McGRATH

Yet another committee met this summer to decide how to change the Faculty of Arts and Science New Program.

The New Program was introduced in the 1969-70 school year partly as a result of an earlier university manifesto, the Macpherson report, which in 1968 suggested sweeping changes in university government and curriculum. The main thrust of the New Program was to abolish the separation of courses in four year honor and three year general programs, as well as to loosen the rigid sequence in which courses were previously taken.

Last year, President John Evans

set up an advisory committee to provide information on the success or failure of the New Program. This committee produced the Berlyne report last March, and during the summer, another committee was working out how to implement the report's recommendations.

The subjects dealt with in the Berlyne report related to quality of teaching (especially at the first-year level), cross-appointments between colleges, and distinctions between general and honours courses of studies.

The report recommended four distinct types of undergraduate programs: the single-major program, a combined-major program, a theme program of courses offered by different departments but related in theme and a liberal-arts program that could be an educational multigateway.

Referring to teaching quality, the committee recommended a more concerted effort on the part of teaching staff "to increase the time they spend on personal contacts with students during office hours as well as informally or socially."

The implementation committee job was to work out how to integrate the Berlyne recommendations into the system. Specific problems: to make it possible for staff to make themselves more accessible to students and to arrange for the increase in lecture-seminars for first-year students that was recommended by the report.

Other staff problems have to be worked out to meet the report's recommendations for subdivisions of large classes, and to institute a teaching bank to facilitate cross-appointments between colleges and divisions with as little financial confusion as possible.

The job is large and confusing, possibly more complicated than the work of the Berlyne committee itself. Arts and Science associate dean, J.E. Foley, who chaired this summer's implementation committee saw the committee's job as one of arranging "who has to do what, where".

The Berlyne committee was instructed to report early last year after only five months research so that some recommendations could be implemented in the fall. The workload was too large to be accomplished in an "unreasonably brief time." The criticism that the job had been too hasty was expressed in a minority report.

According to the implementation committee chairman Foley, the only recommendation that could be carried out this fall is the establishment of two standing committees of the Faculty of Arts and Science—a curriculum committee and a committee on instruction and evaluations. Foley also said that there were other recommendations in the Berlyne report which do not require formal implementation. For example, it is not necessary to legislate for more contact between staff and students through increased staff office hours and consultation.

Foley declined to state specifics of the implementation committee report which will be published later this week, but she hopes to have it on the agenda for the first General Committee meeting of the Faculty of Arts and Science Council on October 1.

A U of T associate professor of medicine, R. Ian Hector, has been accused of racism in a pamphlet recently released by the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS).

Hector, who is also psychiatrist—in-chief at Wellesley Hospital, says that Italians are "culturally predisposed" to play a sick role and that they have a tendency to cheat the Workmen's Compensation Board, according to an SDS brochure.

Hector is also a consultant to the Workmen's Compensation Board (WCB), and his reports have served to justify cut backs in benefits to injured workmen. In recent demonstrations at Queen's Park and at the WCB, the Committee for Just Compensation, a group of 300 disabled workers, has called for Hector's dismissal as a consultant from the board.

The SDS pamphlet describes at some length the case of Guiseppe Pulera, a brick-layer, who was sent to Hector for an examination.

Hector's report to the WCB in November 1970 is called a "case study in racism" by SDS. Pulera is repeatedly referred to as an "Italian", and is described as an individual "culturally and personally predisposed" to illness.

Hector states in his report that Pulera would return to the working force in three to five years, "as the burden of the sick role becomes increasingly heavy," and as long as he is not encouraged in his dependency role through continuation of WCB benefits.

SDS also charges that Wellesley Hospital, where Hector is chief psychiatrist, is producing a film for training interns who treat injured workers. The film is supposed to depict an injured Italian who deliberately takes on a sick role", the brochure states.

Grace period for immigrants affects 1,200 at U of T

By DICK BROWN

More than 30,000 non-Canadian students residing in Canada during 1972 are potentially eligible at this time for landed immigrant status provided they have remained in the country and apply by October 15, according to a spokesman for Immigration Minister Robert Andras.

Of those, more than 1,200 were students at University of Toronto during the 1972-73 academic year, figures at the university statistics and records office reveal.

The current grace period for illegal immigrants to come forward and apply for landed immigrant status under relaxed criteria also applies to more than 90 per cent of the students in Canada with student visas last year, even though they were in the country legally, the spokesman said.

Immigration lawyers and independent immigration counsellors throughout Ontario also confirmed that the law which brings in the grace period makes a majority of last year's non-Canadian students eligible, whether admitted lawfully or illegally still present.

Bill C-197, the amendment to the Immigration Appeal Board Act which provides for the grace period, treats a student as any other applicant, except that students under a contractual obligation to return to their home country are not eligible.

Senior immigration officials in Ottawa said that of the 34,192 student visas held by non-Canadians in 1972, less than 10 per cent of them were under a contractual obligation to go home after their studies were completed.

The "vast majority" of those under such a contractual obligation came to Canada under the auspices of the Canadian International Development Agency, one official said. "The only question I have," he continued, "is whether or not all of them were under CIDA."

University of Toronto records show that 1,424 students during the 1972-73 academic year reported holding student visas, 1,288 full time and 136 part time students. While university records do not give a breakdown of students under a contractual obligation to go home, immigration officials feel the university would probably follow the national pattern.

"It's most confusing for students about this contractual obligation to return home. A student visa simply is not a contractual obligation to go home for the purposes of the grace period," said Katie McGovern, a counsellor for the Toronto Anti-Draft Programme.

"The contract which obliges a student to return to his or her home country is a separate document the student signs at home prior to coming to Canada," she said.

While it appears relatively easy for students to get landed immigrant status under the relaxed rules of the grace period, even immigration officials make some careful qualifications. Among them:

— A student must have entered Canada on or before November 30, 1972 and remained in Canada continuously, and while officials in Toronto are overlooking a weekend trip out of the country, being out of Canada for a longer period of time could make a person ineligible

— A student must register with the immigration department by October 15, with no exceptions of any kind

— A student must not fall into what immigration calls a prohibited class of persons, which includes such things as common criminal and dope convictions

— A student must meet immigration's medical requirements, which are so slack that a person must have something like epilepsy, tuberculosis, cholera, or bubonic plague before he is rejected.

Past that, the grace period law says that any applicant, student or otherwise, who "has made a sincere effort to adapt himself to conditions in Canada by improving his trade, professional or occupational qualifications or his knowledge of the English or French language" is supposed to get landed.

"What that means," said one official immigration spokesman here in Toronto, "is you just can't lose. It's hard to imagine how an otherwise qualified student would be turned down."

He explained immigration's national policy is that a student would have to surrender his or her visa at the time of registration, but would be allowed to continue in

In "all probability," he said, the student would be granted landed status, and thus could continue school uninterrupted. However, in the "highly unlikely event" that the student was turned down, he could appeal the decision, and in case of a final rejection regain student status inside Canada if he could prove he still is a student.

"It's true the government is making it a lot easier for students and other people, too," said anti-draft program counsellor McGovern. "But we've found there are loopholes a person should be careful about, and that's why we think people should get competent independent counselling before going to immigration."

One such loophole she pointed out was that a person must first prove residency in Canada since last November 30 or immigration may not let him register.

"The first thing immigration asks you to do when you walk in the door is to prove your residency. A lot of people don't keep rent receipts, and they probably don't know that an affidavit sworn out in front of a lawyer is enough proof," she said. "That's the sort of thing we're here for."

A lawyer in Ottawa pointed out another pitfall for students. He said immigration could demand a student prove his university courses, in fact, did improve his "trade, professional or occupational qualifications."

"No newspaper is perfect"

"Ever get angry at The Varsity? I bet you do. I do—and I work here."

"It happens when I spot an error in fact. Or read a story that seems written unfairly, or out of balance."

"No newspaper, after all, is perfect. The Varsity isn't."

"But we're trying to be the finest newspaper in North America. I hope you'll help us to reach that goal."

"You can do it by writing to me personally when you think The Varsity is inaccurate or unfair in its news columns. I am now devoting my time as executive editor of The Varsity to listen to your criticisms.

"We newspapermen are usually pretty free in our criticism of other institutions in our society. But we tend to be too thin-skinned to heed criticism directed at us."

"At The Varsity we're trying to change that. That's what I'm here for...to listen to you. Because no newspaper should be too big to listen to its readers."

Grindal wants Laurence for principal

College "X" becomes a downtown reality

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Academic Affairs' part-time student governor Norma Grindal has come up with the person she would like to see as principal of "College X", the college for part-time students proposed for the downtown campus by the year-old Berlyne Committee.

Grindal said Saturday she would not hesitate to present the name of Mary Laurence of the Psychology department to the Search Committee set up by Governing Council this summer.

A report submitted to the Governing Council in June by the Academic Affairs committee agreed with the Berlyne report and urged the establishment of the college so that "as far as possible, students attending evening and summer courses may have access to the same components of university life as is available to those attending the regular winter day sessions."

Grindal said the university faces the prospect of more potential full-time students turning to part-time education.

"This is the writing on the wall unless the government makes university free", she said. As a result, a part-time college is necessary to receive them, added Grindal.

"The college is to be as like as possible" to other colleges, she said. "It is to eliminate the differences in image and in social and education opportunities between full-time and part-time students."

"The issue of image has been the albatross around our neck," Grindal admitted. The principal is to be "a member of the professorial staff of an academic department," said the report.

Grindal said part-time students badly need such a principal, "one who will care whether courses being offered to part-time students are Mickey Mouse courses or courses worth working at".

An academic head will ensure that the part-time student has the same kind of teaching people, the same kind of courses as the full time student and so a degree as valuable as that of full-time student Grindal suggested.

The Academic Affairs report suggested that the principal take office for the 1973-74 academic year.

Innis college president Peter Russell, noting that he had a number of names to submit to the search committee, had not acted to implement this suggestion.

Russell emphasized that the college is "only primarily for part time students." Otherwise, for student admissions, it will function in a manner similar to the colleges for the Faculty of Arts and Science and the professional faculties.

"We are not saying that all part-time students must attend this one college and that no one but part-time students can attend it," Russell said.

"The college will keep part-time students from being treated as second-class students on campus. But we do not want to ghettoize them or create a precinct to which they can be exclusively hived off".

Grindal said that at the present time, the full-time student, should he decide to drop one course, must drop out of his college and "go through a lot of rigamarole" to transfer into extension. With the establishment of part-time college all the student would have to do is transfer to it.

The only additional expenditure necessary to set up the college will be the principal's salary, Grindal said.

The unit of the Division of University Extension concerned with part-time students attending degree courses is already administratively separate from the unit concerned with Continuing Education.

The teaching budget will be carried over from the Department of Extension.

No decision on physical facilities has been made yet, Russell said.

"But obviously these will not be very elaborate."

The college, he said, will probably take over an existing building or part of one somewhere near the academic buildings on St. George St., the location of most part-time lectures.

You'll see how we save you money.

Hydrogate probe provides relief from exciting U of T lectures

By LORNE SLOTNICK

Students who find U of T lectures too stimulating should consider dropping in on the "Hydrogate" hearings for a refreshing dose of boredom.

Yes, just a short stroll from the St. George campus will bring overstimulated students to the Ontario Legislature, site of the public hearings of the select committee on the new Ontario Hydro headquarters.

The hearings, Ontario's answer to the US Senate Watergate Committee, are being held in a "board room" deep in the bowels of the Legislature, so observers would be wise to enquire at the entrance desk before spending the day searching for the committee room.

The committee is investigating allegations of political patronage in the award of a $45 million lease-purchase contract for the new headquarters, now being built at the corner of College and University, just a stone's throw from Queen's Park. The contract was awarded to Canada Square Corporation, headed by Gerhard Moog, self-made business magnate and personal friend of Premier William Davis.

Despite the comparison with Watergate, the Hydro hearings are substantially less interesting for a spectator. In contrast to Watergate's colorful personalities, Hydrogate's participants are uniformly dull.

The only personality worth noting is Moog's lawyer, George Finlayson, who often clashes with committee counsel Richard Shibley while stoutly defending his client's interests. The star among the committee members appears to be James Renwick (NDP, Riverdale).

Even though, unlike Watergate, there is no television coverage of the Hydro hearings, it is safe to say that the public gallery has not been deluged with masses of Ontarians eagerly keeping tabs on politicians and their friends. In fact, an observer should not be surprised if he finds he is the only person in the room not directly involved in the affair.

The few people who at first glance appear to be spectators are actually witnesses, MPP's, and reporters.

Testimony before the committee by the many witnesses is given in excruciating detail, guaranteed to numb the mind of even the most rabid Hydro freak. Moreover, there are very few laughs, so it is understandable that some people are seen dozing off during the hearings.

The room has a clubby atmosphere, seemingly miles away from anything or anyone. The observer soon begins to wonder if the committee members are wasting their time, since the whole matter seems far removed from anything that really concerns the people of Ontario. The inquiry is bogged down in such picaresque details that it is almost impossible to gain an insight into how and whether patronage is doled out by the government.

U of T-City committee a 'waste of time'

By ELAINE KAHN

Four years ago, City Council appointed a subcommittee of five politicians and five university representatives to establish stronger links between the university and the surrounding community.

Since then, the University of Toronto Liaison Committee has held a mere handful of meetings that have accomplished nothing, says Rose Smith, an observer from the Sussex-Ulster Residents Association.

"They just want a group of people to make recommendations, which is a waste of time," Smith said.

"What the committee needs is someone rude — 'the emperor has no clothes' bit," she recommended.

Doug Browne, president of the Annex Ratepayers, said the last meeting, in May, discussed many issues but passed no resolutions — except to add five members from ratepayers groups in the area around U of T.

U of T president John Evans and Ward 6 Alderman William Archer are co-chairmen of the committee. Both were unavailable for comment last weekend.

The Varsity discovered that members of the committee cannot even name their fellow members. University members other than Evans were the least known. Browne supplied the name of Innis principal Peter Russell, but Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap did not have list of the other names, even though he is a member.

A spokesman for Heap's office said that when he asked a woman from U of T's Governing Council why no Governing Council members were on the committee, she said she'd been told the Liaison Committee was a "technical committee that dealt with sewers and things."

One of Smith's concerns — an issue that seems to surface at the beginning of each school year — is the need for a crosswalk on Queen's Park Crescent for students coming to the St. George campus from Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges.

"Any student who survives three or four years learning without getting hit deserves a special medal," she said.

The Varsity—Mike Cowgill

U of T and City want better roads for you (without crosswalks).

Smith said the committee was told that the plans for "tidying up" the roads around Queen's Park were "too technical" for its members to understand.

Heap recently circulated a letter which complained about the lack of a crosswalk, but he told The Varsity that the letter's main concern was not the crosswalk.

"All you healthy young people are not being badly used if you have to walk an extra block or two to find a safer crosswalk," he said.

"What I'm really mad about is that the committee hasn't done anything yet. I seriously suppose it's not meant to do anything," commented Heap.

The spokesman for Heap said the committee should deal with community initiated issues and community use of university facilities and should discuss the low parking rates charged in U of T parking lots.

"Basically, the university is subsidizing its employees to drive downtown," he said.

He said U of T's 3,000 parking spaces represent 20 per cent of the parking available in downtown Toronto.

He compared the $60 it costs for a yearly parking permit at U of T to the $1,200 yearly fee at the Toronto-Dominion Centre.

While you were away...

After five years of planning and controversy, U of T's Governing Council pushed through approval in principle of a Code of Behaviour last June while most of those affected were on vacation. This is the document the Governing Council has been waiting for to deal with any dissident nastiness at the university.

The code is the work of the Internal Affairs Committee, notably of past chairman Paul Cadario, the only student to press for its immediate approval by the Council.

The Code deals with both academic and non-academic offences. A student commits an academic offence if he or she submits false information to the university, such as an essay not written by the student. A non-academic offence includes stealing or damaging university property and disrupting any authorized university activity.

A student accused of plagiarism or cheating (academic offences) may choose to be judged by a university tribunal consisting of three students, two faculty members and a non-voting chairman with legal training. As in a jury trial, the voting members will rule only on questions of fact. Four votes out of five are necessary to secure conviction. With different offences, the composition of the judicial body changes. Non-academic offences (damaging property, theft or "unduly" disrupting university activities) are put before a tribunal with a non-voting chairman, two students and three faculty.

Teaching staff are judged by the same tribunals. If, however, the offence charged is serious enough that it might result in the teacher's dismissal, proceedings must be carried out according to the Haist Rules. These rules govern the ways in which a tenured professor may be removed from his post, and they cannot be superseded by newer regulations such as the Code of Behaviour.

Tribunals are only one of the ways a charge may be settled in the university community. For student academic offences, an informal meeting of parties involved should be arranged by the departmental chairman. If the offence is admitted, no penalty more serious than a mark of zero for the offending piece of work is permitted. If all parties are satisfied that no offence had been committed, the matter is dropped.

If no resolution is reached at the informal hearing or an informal tribunal with no legal assistance, the accused may choose the formal tribunal.

The penalties for offences are varied. Caution and reprimand (the distinction is not clear), are the mildest. The most severe are suspension or expulsion; both require the approval of the president to be carried out.

The vague terms in the section on non-academic offences are bound to cause the most problems where the reader finds a fondness for the words "unduly" coupled with the verbs "disturb" and "obstruct". It is likely that any legal battles fought as the result of student disturbances this year will revolve around the students possible right to "duly" disrupt activities on the campus.

Toros snatch Varsity Arena; SAC hopping

By TIM NAU

Built with student funds and intended for use by the students of the university, Varsity Arena will be used this winter as the home of the Toronto Toros, the new Bassett-owned entry in the World Hockey Association.

While students were away this summer, decisions were made by the Directorate of the University of Toronto Athletic Association and later by Alex Rankin, U of T Vice-President for Business Affairs allowing the Toros to use the Arena on 30 occasions for somewhere between $80,000 and $120,000. According to Rankin, the money would be used for new athletic facilities.

SAC is mad and the campaign to "Ban the Toros" has been underway for some time, although SAC Executive Assistant Art Moses admits that it is probably too late to stop them this season.

The purpose of the "Ban the Toros" campaign is to call attention to the adverse effects the Toros' use of the arena will have on the students and the community and to prevent the renewal of the contract next year.

SAC plans to step up the anti-Toros campaign this fall. The body will distribute a fact sheet to acquaint the students with the issue, says SAC Vice-President Mike Scott, and will also continue urging people to sign its "Ban the Toros" petition. In addition students may be asked to vote on the matter as part of a referendum SAC will conduct in the near future.

SAC feels that since there is a shortage of ice space for students and the public in downtown Toronto, no space should be given to a commercial venture.

U of T administration replied that few students have used the arena on Sunday nights in recent years, when most Toro games are scheduled. The contract also provides that any students who want ice space when the Toros are playing will be transported to other facilities at the Toros' expense, although Toro PR man Mike McLure could not say where ice space would be provided.

Moses argued that the reason students did not use the arena on Sunday night was that rates for that night are three to four times the normal rate for ice rental. He also stated that the Varsity log showed that several community groups used the arena regularly on Sunday nights.

Bruce Kidd, U of T professor and author of "The Death of Hockey" feels that SAC leaders are on weak ground when they oppose the deal on the basis of losing student ice-time.

Kidd also feels the arena probably is underused Sunday evenings, but he is opposed to the Toros deal in principle, remarking that the Toros represent a degraded, commercialized form of hockey. It is not the place of the university, he feels, to help the Bassett family exploit hockey players and fans.

Soccer Blues headed for New York games

by JOHN COBBY

The Blues leave tomorrow for Oneonta, New York, to play their final two exhibition games. These matches, despite their exhibition label, will provide Toronto with a severe test since it's the sole Canadian participant in an international tournament.

Opposition from South America will be provided by MacKenzie

College (Brazil) and from Europe by Birmingham University (England), with the host team, Hartwick College, completing the list of four contenders. The Blues, who have to face Hartwick on Friday and either Birmingham or MacKenzie the next day, will become well aware of their relative international status. Prior to Friday's kickoff they should be considered underdogs, an assessment they hope to disprove. Whatever the results of the tournament, the experience should prove invaluable to the players.

September is traditionally an optimistic month for coaches; forecasts of the glories ahead are uttered with outward assurance, if not inward conviction. As soccer commences its 97th season of play at U of T, Blues' coach Bob Nicol would need to be hard-pressed to ignore a precedent hallowed by the years. So, it is being assumed that the soccer club hopes for a memorable season, and a few reasons for such faith should be given.

The team performance of the preceding campaign can often be of great assistance to those rash enough to forecast future results. Last season's Blues completed an unbeaten league schedule, went on to capture the Ontario Universities

Athletic Association (OUAA) championship, then lost 2-0 in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union (CIAU) semifinal playoffs to the Alberta Golden Bears, the 1972 national champions.

Many of last year's players have returned, both older (which may be a disadvantage) and wiser (an advantage); certainly, having come close to the national title, they will be all the more determined to succeed this year.

However, the performances of 1972 are history and the tough exhibition schedule of four games was arranged to test fully the abilities of the returnees and the newcomers. The second game was played last Saturday, when the Blues lost 4-1 to San Fili, runners-up in the 1972 Canadian amateur club championship. This loss against a high class team exposed Blues' lack of cohesive team play, a problem common in preseason games.

It remains to be seen whether the individual talents of the players can be combined to good effect for the opening league encounter next Wednesday when the MacMaster Marauders, perennial championship contenders, visit Varsity Stadium.

As always, the club appreciates interest and support from members of the University. Home games will be played at Varsity Stadium (no admission charge), and, while soccer players may not be the heaviest or the tallest or the meanest athletes on campus, they have skills which can be appreciated.

Home Schedule
Tuesday, September 18 MacMaster
Saturday, September 22 Guelph
Thursday, October 4 Western Wednesday, October 17 Waterloo
Sunday, October 21 Brock

Midweek games may be changed to an evening kickoff, so check the Varsity before the playing date.

Blues practise in a light game before leaving for New York for the last exhibition games of the season.

State of seige Workers in Chile fighting back

The situation in Chile since Tuesday appears to have developed into a state of civil war in reaction to the junta's crackdown on labor and leftist organizations.

While 20 to 30 individual battles were reported in downtown Santiago Thursday, workers in the industrial suburbs were blowing up their factories, and workers had taken over the reins in Concepcion, the largest city in southern Chile.

All this while General Augusto Pinochet, appointed head of the armed forces two weeks ago, a 55-year-old artillery officer was sworn in as the new president, with the promise "to exterminate Marxism from the country." The junta has warned that anyone opposing their efforts will be shot on sight.

The junta since Tuesday has been arresting Marxist and Communist leaders in the country, as well as Brazilian exiles from the military government of Emilio Medici.

Pinochet has already expressed a desire to unite with the Brazilian government in an axis to combat the popular movements in Latin America.

The coup, which began Tuesday with the navy capture of the coastal city of Valparaiso, came as no surprise to the government of the United States, which admitted knowing of the coup 48 hours in advance.

The U.S. Ambassador to Chile was in Washington over the weekend, arriving Thursday night and returning to Chile Monday, the day before the first offensive.

This silent co-operation with the military establishment within Chile is in line with U.S. efforts within the last few years to stifle the Marxist government of Allende and protect the large Chilean holdings of the International Telephone and Telegraph and Kennecott Copper Corporations.

An ex-U.S. Ambassador to Chile was quoted in the Washington Post of April 16, 1973 as saying that the CIA spent over $20-million in the 1964 election to prevent the victory of Allende, while over $900,000 was given to the Chilean government in 1973 for the training of military personnel and $12.5 million was given in military equipment.

Wednesday, less than 36 hours after the beginning of the coup and less than 24 hours after the death of Allende, the U.S. government officially recognized the new government of Chile.

The government of Mexico has extended asylum to some of Allende's cabinet members, who are reportedly safe in the Mexican embassy in Santiago, and to Allende's wife and children.

Torontonians protesting military seizure of Chilean government carry Chilean flag in demonstration yesterday.

Chilean coup protested

Demonstrations protesting the military coup in Chile have been taking place in Toronto while fighting continues in Santiago. News of the Socialists and Communists rounded up since Monday remains scarce.

Wednesday, 100 people gathered at City Hall, while another 125 assembled Thursday to hear John Morgan, president of the Canadian Peace Congress, talk on the situation in Chile together with Chileans now in Toronto.

"The important task is to press every progressive, democratic, labor and left-wing organization to prevent the government (of Canada) from recognizing the junta," Morgan said.

A message sent to the government of Canada by the CPC and the Toronto Association for Peace read in part: "World anger at fascist aggression against the constitutional authority of the democratically-elected government of Chile demands immediate action by the Canadian government."

So far, the only Canadian reaction has been a letter of condolence sent Wednesday by Parliament to the wife and children of Salvador Allende, president of Chile until his death on the first day of the coup.

Official reports from Santiago say Allende chose suicide, having once said he would only leave the office of president during his term "in a pine box."

Feminist ogled, still guilty

By RANDY ROBERTSON

Feminist Adrienne Potts, convicted yesterday for possession of marijuana but given an absolute discharge, threatened to complain to the head Crown attorney about the "sexist" attacks of the Crown prosecutor.

The prosecutor said Potts was indulging in "wishful thinking" in accusing the two police officers who arrested her of having ogled and propositioned her.

Potts, the prosecutor said, is not the type of person who would be given this kind of attention.

"Many, many others walking Bloor Street (where Potts was arrested) would rate for more attention than she," he said.

"Sexist! Sexist!" Potts yelled.

The audience — approximately 25 women supporters of Potts — hissed.

"Pig", one muttered.

The prosecutor noted that on the night of her arrest Potts was wearing "a blue denim jacket, blue jeans, a purple T-shirt and black army boots".

Potts, a member of the women's collective that puts out the Other Women newspaper and a paramedic at the Women's Medical Clinic (Women's Place), later claimed that "what went on in the courtroom was a very blatant instance of what goes on every day in the streets."

The prosecutor's actions were "very sexist, very racist," she said. Judge Charles Oppen said the prosecutor's remarks were fair given Potts' attack on the police; "...they have reputations too."

The judge's decision was "a complete sell-out", Potts claimed.

Oppen, saying that "we have come to believe our police are a little bit above the average", stated that Potts' denial of the officers' charges and their reconstruction of her arrest, "constituted in toto a different story". And we cannot say the police are liars."

Oppen found Potts' claims that the police had propositioned her very difficult to believe."

"The accused person is not a good witness for herself." She is "given to a little fantasy on these things," he concluded.

"And maybe I'm naive," he added, "but I can't see these officers as doing this."

Potts, arrested May 15, claimed that she had no marijuana in her possession at the time and that the police officer had arrested her to retaliate for her lack of interest in his attentions.

The prosecutor asked Potts why she thought she was being propositioned, why she thought she was so attractive. Potts refused to answer this "because it was a moral question."

Potts did however say that she was "tired of being sized up as a piece of meat".

FEUT firing 'sexist'

By MARINA STRAUSS

A woman working in the duplicating room of the Faculty of Education has charged that the university fired her on the grounds of sex.

Barbara Massey filed a complaint against the Faculty of Education to the Ontario Human Rights Commission. She claims that the Faculty Dean's administrative assistant G. Mitchell fired her with the sole explanation that "it is more of a man's job, with heavy lifting."

Massey was operator in the Faculty's duplicating room during the month of August. She ran a collating machine, a Gestetner, and she delivered papers.

"The heaviest thing to lift was boxes, about 50 pounds each, that I had no problems with," Massey contends. Another employee working in the same room could help her, she added.

Massey was hired as temporary help when her brother left the position on short notice. She was happy with her job and had hoped to stay on permanently.

Mitchell refused to make any comments to The Varsity until the Commission's hearing was terminated.

However, in a statement issued to the Ontario Human Rights Commission, Mitchell admits to telling her that "it's a man's job," Massey said.

The Commission's officer N. Mawande received "confidential" statements bearing complaints from the Faculty's registrar office of faded Gestetner copies received from Massey.

In addition, Massey was apparently witnessed "entertaining" male friends.

The statement accuses Massey of arriving late to work twice. It points out that she was hired through irregular procedures. Both Mitchell and assistant professor J. H. Dool, who hires staff at the Faculty, were absent at the time. Mitchell says the accountant in the office hired her.

"My work and performance to my knowledge has been more than satisfactory," Massey wrote in her statement to the Commission.

"If any of the copies were faded," Massey contends, "it was due to the poor machinery. Otherwise I wouldn't have delivered it."

She admitted that "once in a while guys would come to see me", but she objects to the word "entertaining" male friends.

She compensated for coming in late by skipping a break, she says.

"I don't wish to comment on her performance on the job," Mitchell told The Varsity.

Junta hunts

General Bob Gauthier, who suddenly took power in a military coup at The Varsity last year, has announced that the first weekly meeting of his junta (otherwise known as this year's Varsity staff) will take place at 1 pm at 91 St. George.

He revealed that his band of conspirators will discuss the first issues of the paper and news priorities, and will elect a representative to the Varsity Board of Directors. New staff are more than welcome but will be frisked at the door.

Parity back as issue

The Governing Council's powerful Executive Committee has made the first move in the expected fight over revisions to the U of T act next year by setting up a 15-member review committee including only three students.

The action will have to be approved next week by the full Governing Council. The only opposition came from student governor Howard Levitt who tried unsuccessfully to have the decision put off for a month.

In 1971 the Act was passed setting up the unicameral governing structure to replace the Board of Governors and Senate. A major battle for parity student representation was almost successful.

Earlier in 1968 the Commission on University Government (CUG) democratically elected with staff-student parity had recommended a bicameral structure with equal representation for staff and students. Former U of T President Laude Bissell was one of the members of CUG, but later changed his position to oppose staff-student parity.

The Conservative government bowed to last minute pressure from the U of T Faculty Association and changed a formula that would have given students parity. The present set up includes 12 faculty and eight students.

Then UTFA president James Conacher charged at that time that it was "too dangerous to start with parity. Students are not prepared to participate in the function of the university."

Other faculty joined him and the onslaught was successful. Now a tight looms again over changes in the act. In 1971 when students were denied parity the government consoled them with the promise of a review in two years time.

Levit argued that the suggested composition of the committee would make its recommendations a forgone conclusion. Other members of the committee will include three teaching staff, two alumni, three lay members, one presidential appointee and one from administrative staff.

Levit said other members of the committee were hostile to his request for a delay and "railroaded" the resolution through.

'Charges against SSSC were trumped up'

The seven students and workers arrested at 215 Huron St. on February 1 while picketing against the lay-offs of campus workers and the fee increases at U of T are proving in court the trumped-up nature of these arrests.

To date, six of eight charges have been thrown out of court. The two convictions, which resulted in an absolute and a conditional discharge, are under appeal.

Significant things about the trials are that the accused have defended themselves in court and that the trials have been characterized by long delays.

In the trial of Claude Browne, Browne managed to get P.C. Perry's written statement to the events of February 1 introduced as evidence (Perry was the first, and the chief Crown witness) during Perry's cross-examination. The next day, Browne went over the statement, revealing the many blatant contradictions between it and Perry's verbal testimony, forcing Judge Foster to admit that Perry had made some "very serious mistakes". This left the judge no recourse but to throw both charges out of court within the space of a few minutes. Another significant aspect of the trials are that the judges have frequently disallowed relevant and vital questions put by the accused to prosecution witnesses under cross-examination — making it very difficult for the accused to defend themselves. This clearly shows that in a political trial the idea that one is innocent until proven guilty goes out the window and that the onus is, in practice, on the accused to prove his innocence — which is made extremely difficult when prosecution witnesses are lying and the judge tries to prevent the accused from exposing these lies.

Another result of the trials is that the U of T administration's conspiracy to smash the progressive groups involved in the picketing — the Canadian Liberation Movement, the Stop the Student Surcharge Committee, and U of T Workers Against the Layoffs — has been exposed in court. The people arrested at 215 Huron and the Canadian Liberation Movement are determined to win the remaining trials and the appeals. One of the best ways you can help is to come to the trials to show your support for those arrested and to see how the system of "justice" operates in political trials.

Canadian citizens are still in an absolute minority in all teaching and administrative positions in all post-secondary educational institutions in English-speaking Canada. Only 49.4 per cent of professors and administrators are Canadian citizens, down from last year's figure of 49.9 per cent and 23.5 per cent, an increase of 2.6 per cent, are U.S. citizens.

This clearly shows the takeover of our universities by U.S. professors, who serve as the cultural and educational emissaries of U.S. imperialism. This is as true of the supposedly "radical" U.S. professors as of the openly reactionary ones. They may support, for example, the Vietnamese people's right to self-determination, but look down on Canadians and push the line that everything Canadian, our culture, our history, etc. is second-rate and dull, and laugh at the struggle of the Canadian people for independence. This arrogant attitude is carried across into teaching as is shown by the dearth of Canadian course content and the deliberate ignoring of relevant Canadian problems (such as U.S. imperialism). This has created a colonial mentality among Canadian students. U.S. professors are, significantly, concentrated in culturally and ideologically sensitive areas such as the humanities and the social sciences, which are over 60 per cent non-Canadian. Examples of U.S. control at U of T are R.A. Green—Dean of Arts and Science, and IM Zeitlin, Chairman of Sociology—both U.S. citizens.

The federal government encourages the takeover with the tax holiday, an agreement which Canada has with 14 other countries inviting visiting professors to come to Canada by offering them a two year tax exemption provided that they stay for only two years. It is U.S. professors who most use and abuse it. This is bad enough but even worse, many U.S. professors take the tax holiday and stay for more than two years, violating the agreement, committing fraud. The federal government and the universities know full well that the tax fraud is going on, have the relevant information in their records, and yet not one of the guilty has yet been prosecuted! The universities moan about declining enrolment, tuition fees went up by $100 last year (clearly contributing to declining enrolment), and yet not a whisper from the universities about prosecuting those guilty of the tax fraud which amounts to tens of millions of dollars stolen from the Canadian people since the tax holiday started, and the millions of dollars legally given away to those U.S. professors who left after two years.

Late last night The Varsity collective decided to suspend our regular stories from page three to publish a timely and, we feel, relevant analysis of the events leading up to the present crisis in Chile. We apologize to our staff members whose articles we couldn't print. Space permitting, and if the stories are not "old news" we will publish the pulled material Monday. The following special feature was generously released to us by the Latin American Working Group. We hope it answers some questions that aren't being covered through the Toronto dailies.

The essential roots of this week's coup go back almost a year, to the truck-owners' strike of October, 1972, when the obstruction and subversion of the government by rightist elements in Chile became an open strategy.

The majority parties in the Congress, the traditionalist right-wing National Party, and the "centrist" Christian Democratic Party, utilized their votes in Congress to block almost every Executive initiative, while at the same time subjecting government ministers to verbal attacks and resolutions of impeachment, forcing resignations and ministry-juggling.

This campaign gained momentum on the legislative front with the mid-term election campaign for Congress in February and March 1973. Eduardo Frei, former Christian Democratic President ran for the Senate, calling for the return of a two-thirds majority for the right and centre to enable them to impeach and dislodge Allende. (Frei was constitutionally unable to succeed himself in 1970, and was anxious to find the shortest route back to the Presidential Palace.)

The electoral campaign failed. The left accomplished the historic achievement of increasing their support in "mid-term" elections, something no recent governing group had succeeded in doing, and Frei's idea of a legalistic "coup" was blocked. Lacking his two-thirds majority, Frei was elected to the Senate, where, as it's President, he gained a platform for continued attacks on the government.

The second element in the anti-Allende strategy was to utilize certain key economic groups to block the economic reforms of the government. A strike was mobilized among the businessmen who operated the trucking industry in Chile. While never universal, the truck-owners strike was a reaction against the Government plan for state initiative in transportation, and serves a strategic blow to economic stability in the elongated strip of land that is Chile.

Merchants and businessmen's groups, doctors and other professionals joined in. It wasn't a strike in collective bargaining terms, with some potential for settlement, but an all-out attempt to overthrow the government by creating economic paralysis severe enough that the armed forces might intervene or else the government would collapse.

A third element accompanied the legislative and economic attacks sabotage. Supplies were hoarded and destroyed, factory-owners attempted to close out workers from production, and right-wing groups attacked non-striking truckers and various government agencies.

But the strategy of the reactionaries failed. Allende was able to keep his coalition together, maintain order, and gain the effective co-operation of the armed forces. With the addition of several military men to his cabinet, led by Army Commander Carlos Prats, he outwitted the right, putting them in the unenviable position of having to attack their long-potential allies the armed forces, who in turn were assuming the mantle of "defenders of the constitutional presidency".

While this strategy enabled the President and the UP to maintain control of the situation and the country, the real key to their survival was the support the government received from Chile's people.

Chilean workers, students and peasants mobilize and create a new revolutionary consciousness and direction

The response of workers, students and peasants to the truck-owners strike was overwhelming. Volunteers unloaded trains and delivered foodstuffs to working class districts, distributing supplies from the backs of trucks. Medical students and nurses staffed hospitals in the face of the doctors' strike.

Vigilance committees were set up in neighborhoods and factories to prevent sabotage.

In October, the military and the organized working class joined forces to keep the country going in the face of a direct challenge to the revolutionary process.

Most of this activity occurred in response to the situation rather than as a result of formal government initiatives. The government had taken one key initiative, however, which was the organization of Committees of Price Control and Supply in neighborhoods, known as JAPs.

The JAPs were designed to protect the daily welfare of the Chilean working people and poor. Since workers' real wages had increased and demand for everyday needs had risen prices rose as well, and scarcities became acute. Everyday necessities were subject to hoarding by merchants and the rich. Scalpers abounded.

The Minister of the Economy's initiative of the JAPs was supported by the networks of the various government parties, particularly the Communists. Working class neighborhoods established committees that went to merchants and invited them to co-operate by charging official prices.

If they co-operated neighborhood residents would patronize them, and the state distribution agency would give them priority in delivery of scarce items. If they charged speculative prices, they wouldn't get those scarce items (from the state at least), and neighborhood women would organize a boycott of their store.

These actions gave a large measure of power, backed up by the state authority, to ordinary people in their everyday life. Housewives — previously unorganized and largely powerless — gained power.

During the October strike these JAPs, together with other neighborhood associations — Mother's Centres, Community Health Councils, Community Centres — experienced a tremendous heightening of class consciousness and acquired competence for their actions.

The necessity to come to grips with the wide-ranging problems that confronted them gave the working people a society-wide perspective, and a sense that the country and its material welfare were theirs. They found they had the ability to decide and choose and grew in a spirit of self-reliance.

The events of October couldn't have occurred two years previously. Heightened consciousness and better organization had developed before and during the strike. The former consciousness of the Chilean workers and peasants, which had focused on trade-union organization and traditional legislative channels was changing. It was giving way to a broader class conscious perspective; new social relationships were emerging, within and beside the shell of the old forms.

A similar growth in-consciousness occurred in rural Chile, where peasants and landless workers were being organized into new co-operative farming units. The truckers strike played havoc with deliveries of supplies essential for spring planting, — seed, fertilizer, etc.

Once again, confronted with the essential realities of their situation, the people realized their capabilities. They also directed an increasing amount of support toward the Allende Government.

While the Christian Democratic party had formerly counted on large segments of the peasantry for support, the peasants in the elections of March, 1973, showed a definite swing to the Socialist party, which in several areas was supported by the Movement of the Revolutionary Left (MIR). The Socialists, given this new support doubled their representation in the Chamber of Deputies.

In factories, a process had begun which was virtually irreversible. Cordones industriales — autonomous workers' defence committees, were set up in plant after plant. Growing out of the workers' attempts to maintain production when the employers tried lock-outs in October, they emerged as rank-and-file organizations which could mobilize sectors of the work force that formerly could not have been mobilized, (particularly in smaller industrial centres and in the south).

In June, when an army unit attempted a coup, workers occupied factories in response to the Government's call to defend them. These "cordones" increased in effectiveness and took the process beyond the traditional matrix of political party organization.

This process was particularly threatening for the Christian Democrats who were very proud of their strength in the labour movement (slightly less than one-third in the Trade Union Federation votes). The Christian Democrats had been prone to use attempts to arouse local workers' control and participation as a way of attacking the government's need to maintain some central control over production.

In June this process began to back-fire. If Christian Democrat workers could join their Socialist, and Communist allies in occupying factories, they saw little reason to return those factories to their owners — often prominent Christian Democrats. The base of the Christian Democratic Party was being eroded. The polarization was occurring at such a rate that the right wing of the Christian Democrats — around Eduardo Frei and Patricio Aylwin — saw their road to power blocked. An increasingly articulate and conscious majority of Chileans would stand in the way.

Many routes: one coup. Operation Ripe Pear.

The basic strategy of the right continued all summer: create economic chaos, throw in a bit of sabotage and terrorism, let nothing pass in Congress save attacks on Allende's constitutional legitimacy.

In the armed forces the political polarization broke through the rhetoric of loyalty to the constitution and pledges of political neutrality.

A tank battalion attempted to initiate a coup in late June, attacking the Presidential Palace, and hoping for support in the navy and air force. General Prats, leader of the Moderates or Constitutionals within the armed forces, rejoined Allende's cabinet a month later.

But Prats found an increasingly desperate situation in the armed forces. Naval commanders, annoyed at men who had prevented their participation in the June 29 coup attempt, undertook a purge of 100 seamen, with torture and brutality prevalent.

Army men and police undertook heavy-handed searches for arms among factory workers and left-wing militants. One worker was shot dead in an arms search in the southern city of Punta Arenas.

Meanwhile the "germ of insurrection" was spreading in the armed forces as officers and men of upper-class backgrounds and conservative sympathies conspired to undermine Prats' moderate constitutionalist leadership.

These rightist elements in the armed forces were increasingly in touch with like-minded elements in the Christian Democratic and Nationalist Party leaderships. Eduardo Frei spun a complex web of careful but subversive relationships with a multitude of officers.

The "democratic" legislators from the CD and National parties passed a resolution in Congress on August 22, calling the Allende government "illegitimate" and suggesting that the military men who had re-entered the cabinet in early August should separate themselves from Allende and the UP.

Allende made a direct, and what now seems a prophetic, reply to this campaign. He said the resolution symbolized "the abandonment by certain sectors of the civic values most essential to democracy. To propose that the armed forces carry out government functions outside the direction and political control of the President is to promote a coup d'etat". That is precisely what Frei, the Nationalists and their allies were doing. As one member of the National Party put it to journalists on August 28, "Even if we must kill 20,000 enemies in order to liquidate the government, we must be ready to do it."

The game of confrontation played by these elements was leading to a further shearing away of their own support. Radomiro Tomic, the Christian Democratic candidate for President in 1970, refused to support Frei's strategy and was joined by other prominent Christian Democrats including the former president of the party.

Tomic pointed out that it was as reasonable for the President to ask the military to close down Congress as it was for Congress to ask the military to impose their will on Allende. But these words did not shake right-wing control over strategy.

The para-military squads of the ultra-right were adding their unique contribution as well. Patria y Libertad, the fascist clandestine movement responsible for much of the sabotage attempts of the past undertook an enlarged campaign of bombings, assassinations and subversion in August. They bombed a pipeline, wounding 17 workers, assassinated Arturo Aray, Allende's aide de camp and attacked the MOPARE, a movement of truck drivers favoring the government who were transporting primary necessities and fuel in defiance of the truck owners strike. The headquarters of the Trade Union Federation was bombed, as were the Cuban and North Korean embassies.

The police captured the leader of Patria y Libertad, Roberto Thiemé, in August, as he dined in an expensive suburban Santiago restaurant. He declared he had been involved in close coordination between the leaders of the truck owners strike, and the National Party. He outlined the PyL campaign to discredit constitutionalist elements in the army, and strengthen the right.

The themes familiar in the strikes of October, 1972, were repeated in August 1973: legislative obstruction and conspiracy, attempts by transport-owners to bring the country to its knees economically, sabotage and assassination by the ultra-right.

With the ominous addition of the increasingly powerful right wing groups in the military, these forces converged in "Operation Ripe Pear" the code name of the effort to discredit and undermine the government.

The fruits of their labor are now helping to take their toll of human lives in Chile.

Getting into the classics

By DAVID BASSKIN

Traditionally, university is the place where many students get their first taste of classical music. In times gone by, the place to hear the music was in notoriously dull music-appreciation class.

But the present route is far more enjoyable.

Whether it was in Death in Venice, A Clockwork Orange or 2001, at one time or another we've all been indirectly exposed to the classics. Even something as banal and hokey as the turgid and schmaltzy version of Mozart's fortieth symphony that Waldo de los Rios recorded a couple of years back can serve as a good enough introduction.

You might hear someone practicing a Beethoven sonata down the hall in your residence, or perhaps be sitting in Hart House when an impromptu concert suddenly starts up around you.

Maybe you'll be wandering up to the Edward Johnson Building, the home of the Faculty of Music, and hear it coming at you from all sides.

Ideally, the best way to get introduced to classical music is to hear it in the flesh, just as thousands have done over the past couple of summers at the Toronto Symphony's series of free concerts at Ontario Place's Forum.

For a live performance during the school year, try the Massey Hall box office the evening of a Toronto Symphony's series of free get cheap student or rush tickets.

But inevitably the urge comes along to get one's hands on a record to complement Leon Russell or Cat Stevens, and the neophyte classical music fan makes her or his first trip to the classical department of the local record shop.

The first problem is usually the great diversity of records available. As an example, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, popularized by the pop arrangement of Song of Joy is available in some 31 different recordings, priced anywhere from $2.39 to $13.98.

How to choose?

By big-name conductor or orchestra? by label? by price? by cover photo? All these factors contribute to the choice, but for most students the major consideration is price.

Why does one recording of a certain work cost $6.39 and another only $1.90? There are many reasons, but the low-price records generally fall into two categories: first, there are great recordings of the past, remastered to look new, with new sleeves and photos. Second, there are promotional records designed to introduce a new artist or label. This type of record costs little to produce, so a lower price tag is not necessarily out of the question.

The first type is by far the largest. For example, Bruno Walter (one of the best conductors the New York Philharmonic ever had) recorded the nine Beethoven Symphonies in 1960 for Columbia. They were issued in a deluxe boxed edition of nine records which went for over sixty dollars, yet today those same classic performances are available on Columbia's budget line, Odyssey, for about 20 bucks.

All of the major labels run budget lines, mostly centered around reissues of this sort. The price tag is low because most of the expenses were incurred years ago when the recording was made, and the present price reflects the only expense—manufacturing.

Why buy full-price recordings, then? They still have plenty to offer, although that can be taken with a grain of salt in light of the fact that 60 or 70 percent of all the new recordings made today are just additional recordings of works already over-represented in the catalogue. They're nothing if not safe bets, and you can always sell a few hundred thousand copies of Tchaikovsky's fourth, even if it's played by a chorus of trained penguins.

There are some advantages to paying top dollar, though. Expensive recordings, such as Mahler symphonies cost so much to produce that the full price must be charged for the record. On the other hand, new releases are usually at the pinnacle of current recording quality. The quality of the pressing is important to many, especially those who own expensive stereo equipment. If all you've got is a fleetwood console, don't feel obliged to lay out as much as six or seven bucks for a super-quality imported European pressing; it just won't show that fast little bit of quality unless it's played on top-notch gear.

But where does this electronic rambling leave our bewildered neophyte? Standing in front of the record rack, that's where. The first place to look for straightforward evaluation of records is in the review sections of magazines like High Fidelity, Stereo Review and Gramophone, which cover not only new recordings but re-issues as well.

The Varsity—Michael Cowger

There's one drawback here, though. These reviews are not usually written beginner-style, and can be confusing unless you know the music already.

This is where the paper you're reading comes into play.

The Varsity will be reviewing a lot of records this year, and considerable emphasis will be placed on talking about the music and the performance in terms non-experts can understand. As well, we'll have weekly notes on specials and sales in the Toronto stores.

One solid-gold hint: if you don't want to lay out any bread at all, but still want to hear a first-class collection of recorded music, head over to the Edward Johnson Building. On the third floor is the library, with an excellently stocked listening room. Braun turntables, Stax electrostatic headphones, and over sixty thousand records. It's free, with your ATL card. Bet you didn't think anything was free down here. As well, CBC-FM (94.1) and CJRT-FM (91.1) play a huge amount of classical music every day.

Any hints, suggestions, questions, ideas or requests can be sent to the music editor, The Varsity, 91 St. George St.

Getting back into pop

Just as exams were ending in April the music scene was nestling into one of its lowest points in quality output in years.

It took a few months of musical dreariness but some familiar faces eventually came around with new sounds. On that mysterious scale of absolutes, these endeavours are marred but relatively speaking, they're gems.

Two artists who've had little critical praise since their initial successes, Carole King and Cat Stevens both tried reaching for the brass ring again during the summer.

INSIPID FRESHNESS

Stevens' latest album, Foreigner (A & M) represents a definite break from the established patterns. The most notable changes include the absence of guitarist Alun Davies, who was instrumental in setting the tone for earlier albums (especially Tea For The Tillerman), producer Paul Samwell-Smith and arranger Del Newman. Stevens assumes the production chores himself for the first time and shifts the emphasis in his songs from the driving-percussive guitar, to piano (a trend that began on Catch Bull A Four), Jean Roussel, keyboard player on Catch Bull, now handles the brass and string arrangements and there's a conspicuous r & b-flavoured female backup choir in evidence.

The album, from the 18 minute long, elegant movement, "Foreigner Suite" to the four songs on side two, suffers from under-writing and over-production; the unusually insipid lyrics are simply unworthy of all the musical embellishments and the over-emotional delivery that accompanies them. But his quest for a fresh sound is a step in the right direction. Maybe it'll all come together on the next album.

KEEP PERSEVERING

Fantasy (Ode/A&M), is Carole King's first attempt to really get out of her Tapestry rut. In the first cut she explains the songs are all make-believe, in an attempt to justify wandering from her immediate experience. Her compositions, which have a gentle jazz feeling this time around, run together to give the impression of unity. It makes for fine background music if that's what you're after. Carole King fans who've persevered this far won't have any complaints.

BELOVED

There Goes Rhymin' Simon (Columbia) by Paul Simon was clearly the best recording to premier, this summer. Simon's song-writing just seems to get better and better and his musical ideas are rich and varied as he explores ballad, gospel and reggae forms. Rhymin' Simon proves Paul Simon, in his first attempt at production, to be a sensitive economic artistic engineer. Every instrument is used with imagination and balance not a sound seems out of place.

Favorites are difficult to pick from a collection that's this good. "American Tune" is an apologetic anthem to the USA that's among Simon's finest songs. The use of vocalists like Reverend Claude Jeter in the liting "Take Me To The Mardi Gras" or the Dixie Humming Birds in "Tenderness" and "Loves Me Like A Rock" was pure genius. There Goes Rhymin' Simon is an excellent album from America's finest singer-songwriter.

POST-BEATLE DRIP

The saddest part of the Beatles demise was realizing that the sum of the parts was less than the whole. With a few exceptions (mainly in George Harrison's All Things Must Pass and in the case of John Lennon's Image (the individual efforts of the four musicians, who formed the most successful musical aggregation of the last decade, have been disappointing in their lyrical vagidity and lack of musical quality).

The newest releases by Paul McCartney and George Harrison do little to change the established post-Beatle musical drought.

Paul McCartney's Red Rose Speedway (Apple/Capitol) is the most well performed McCartney Wings disc yet, but that isn't saying much for it. The music is still at a constant juvenile level as represented by the melodies which tend towards little ditties more than mature musical statements and the repetitive sub-teenage-mentality lyrics.

The writing on George Harrison's Living In The Material World isn't bad, it's just not up to his earlier standards. Otherwise, his production is commendable and his guitar work surprisingly good. It's unfortunate that his messages from now on will drag us all along on his own spiritual trips. "Sue Me Sue You Blues" presents an interesting insight into Harrison's feelings about the Beatles' split. The other songs were pleasant although religious revelations. All apologies to Sri Krsa.

DESOLATION LIVE

One of the most important releases of the summer was Leonard Cohen's fourth album, Live Songs (Columbia). Cohen, the undisputed master of desolation row, has a way of engulfing you in his sorrow-filled emotion. The ten songs were recorded at various concert performances in 1972 or 1970, mostly in Europe, with a tasteful seven-piece backup group.

Cohen's voice is remarkably good considering it's usual blandness and difficulty staying in tune. Most of the material is old but in almost every case is more immediate than his studio versions. "Please Don't Pass Me By" will never rank as one on Cohen's better poem-songs but it certainly is one of his most urgent and emotion-laden efforts.

While in the city a few months ago, Cohen discounted earlier reports that he was leaving the recording industry, saying more material of the quality of Live Songs would be forthcoming in time.

Theatre

Angry 50's hit armchair '70s

In 1956 the English stage was radicalized by Jimmy Porter, the angry young man of John Osborne's "Look Back in Anger". But today Porter bears more relationship to the disaffected college student than to a social system of class inequality. Like the frustrated jazz musician Osborne created, our angry young people have slipped from the revolutionary sixties back into arm-chair apathy and verbal violence — another incidence of a fifties revivalism.

The newly created Performing Theatre Company, operating out of the Central Library Theatre, achieves a fascinating portrayal of the dependent relationships of the three central characters: Jimmy, educated working-class; Alison, his well-to-do wife; and Cliff, their marital referee-in-residence.

Too clever and too conscious of himself to remain at the bottom of the social ladder but too angry and inert to climb up on someone else's terms, Jimmy Porter, in effect, de-classes himself. And although a spokesman against his society, he is in the paradoxical position of being a non-representative type, a kind of hybrid between Cliff and Alison.

Geoffrey Saville-Read creates the emotional range necessary for Jimmy's savage alienation to work on the stage. The long tirades of the script come close to a dramatic over-play of words, but Read's shifts to little boy defencelessness sustain sympathy and interest.

David Yorston as Cliff interacts beautifully with both husband and wife, side-stepping the love/hate of their relationship to provide the downbeat relief of the middle position.

Krysia Jarmicka-Read as Alison is both the long-suffering butt of Jimmy's contempt and a cherished love object. Continually cued to this split attitude, she reacts equally well in either position. The two Read's are completely in tune with each other as they portray the reconciliation of the warring couple in the final scene.

But in the end, as Alison and Jimmy begin their childish games again, pretending they are squirrel and bear, it is apparent that they are trapped in their own self-defeat. Osborne gives them (perhaps) a reconciliation of their marriage but not their life, there is still nowhere for them to go but the zoo of their own living-room.

The power of the play resides not only in the obvious condemnation of British society in the fifties but in the larger issue of an educated de-classed young person enervated by both present actuality and future possibility.

Playwright lifts us from dung — barely

Beckett's fascination with the damning potential of the spoken word, banal, accusative, guilt-ridden, is given full reign in his double monologue plays at the St. Lawrence Centre.

Although hesitant to slip into anal imagery, it is tempting to view the first play "Krapp's Last Tape" as a final strained attempt to relieve verbal constipation, only to find that there is nothing there, and the second "Not I" as a horrific attack of verbal diarrhea. But although Beckett insists that life in the end leaves us sitting in a dung-heap of our own making he also gives us more than this.

Krapp in his final decrepit state at last leaves behind the illusions and pompous verbiage of his earlier self. The incriminating tapes can be swept into the garbage along with all the words about love, dreams, memories and experiences; words which are now as lost to time as the feelings which created them. Technically Hume Cronyn's finely honed interpretation of Krapp is perfect but he fails to suggest that this is also, or was once, a man of feeling. A beautifully detailed and consistent performance somehow emerges as being cold in humanity.

From the closing sputter of wheezes and snores of the first play where words have run their course "Not I" takes us into a world of nothing but words. All we have of Jessica Tandy is a spotlighted mouth suspended in space and the frantic words which spew forth from it. Also on the dimly lit stage is a huge puppet-like form which occasionally lifts an arm and drops it futilely.

The vehemence of the words is at first repellent but the power of their expression becomes hypnotic. Stripping the play of place, time and character, Beckett places a dislocated mouth in space and makes us listen to the common flow of our lives.

'City' could be better but the coffee's nice

The extension of Chicago's "The Second City" to Toronto is a much needed addition to our theatrical scene. For the first time we can enjoy a night club atmosphere (without the glitz) and a cup of coffee while being entertained.

The revue-type format of Toronto's "Second City" is still feeling its way — pushing the punch lines and leaning heavily on stock types and situations which allow for easy recognition and easy laughs. Sketches like the muscle-bound All-Canadian Football Team, the VD patient in the hospital waiting-room or the Home and School Association meeting discussing sex education in the classroom tickle the sides but do not provoke much comic surprise.

A more innovative promise is shown by the clever convolutions of the Pirandello number in which the various characters, encyclopedia salesman, housewife, husband, doctor, slip in and out of a "mondo bizarro" of madness and role exchange.

And even though the 50's nostalgia craze is threatening to revive itself right out of camp and into cult, the group enacted a beautifully worked-out spoof of the greaser, drive-in crowd. The clichés have never been funnier.

The improvisation sequence, built out of suggestions from the audience, also showed ingenuity and a more subtle control of the highs and lows of comic tension.

The blah, the bad and the empty —and for $3

The chief difference between me and you is that I get into movies free. You pay three dollars. I am used to carrying my passes in my pocket and wandering into a show, Harrod Experiment for instance. Peter, who came with me, is used to paying. But even though he got in on the passes, he still felt ripped off. While I agreed with him that Harrod Experiment must be one of the worst movies ever made, it didn't bother me. For free, you can enjoy it as some kind of unframed satire. But for three dollars you are implicated. For six, a pair of admissions, you have to be embarrassed: you could have spent the money on dinner and the planetarium.

One of the forms of criticism I learned as a kid was a balloon filled with paint. At Harrod, I vaguely hoped somebody would throw one at the screen. I couldn't do it, being a guest, but someone who paid would have had the right, I think. Audiences here, and movie audiences in particular, are too timid. Norman Mailer attributes the life of theatre to the unlikely but constant possibility of an actor being booed off the stage. A purveyor of shoddy goods can be sued; the snake-oil salesman ran the risk of tar-and-leathers; pornographers chance the cops. At three dollars each, movie showing should be a more speculative affair.

Blume in love

Free admission makes you more tolerant but it can't save a real turkey. There has to be something in the film. (The total banality was the something for Harrod Experiment, Blume in Love is just awful.

You can tell about a film by the opening sequence. Bill MacVicar and I once saw a double bill of Truffaut's Bed and Board and Agnes Varda's Le Bonheur. When we left, about twenty minutes into Bonheur, we tried to figure out what the difference was. Bill pointed to the beginnings: Truffaut opens on pretty heroine mincing through her Paris marketing giving vendors the unnecessary information that she was now "a married woman". Varda began with languid pastoral shots of a picnic: wildflowers, sunshine, blond children. Nothing happened in the opening of Le Bonheur, and nothing happened in the rest except the plot, none of the little bits of business that keep you alive.

Blume in Love opens on the pillars in St. Mark's Square and then moves to George Segal sitting in an outdoor cafe reminiscing about his honeymoon there. ("For ten days there was the honeymoon, then came the marriage".) The movie never improved and for the life of me I can't see why we stayed to the end. There are a thousand things wrong with the picture, but they are all over-shadowed by the fact that it's a comedy and it's not funny.

Two tangential notes: Rolling Stone called Blume in Love Kris Kristofferson's best movie to date; and (I'm not sure why this demands to be included) the climax of the film is a rape that turns out to be just what the leading lady needed and wanted all along.

James Mason unravels and unravels in Sheila

High movie prices and shoddy shan splattered against the screen the audience

Touch of class

A Touch of Class should be considered, although both star George Segal and a nominal comedy about the angle. But Class has the lines: It's stupid as a baseball game in a London play slightly past baseball age. As you can top). Looked at objectively, the ab Blume, in fact worse, but you watch funny, and it has class. Glenda Jackson's more of the character than the wit is so good it's distracting, as if she were right. Were Segal an actor of her weight. Were Segal an actor of thing might have sunk. As it is, he would ever see in a schnook film a really an incredible performance. The gags (and many of them) are a touch of class, as it were.

A Touch of Class is the kind of price hike. A stinker is a stinker piece (Cries and Whispers). The more you pay. A Touch of Class is just can afford it.

It is even harder to recommend the night I saw it. Like all Peter out-of-date, something Bogdanovich walked into a film archives to dozen years later to make his pornographers have become still find common right and culture, and well, but it's a hell of a gift to assume but couldn't sustain.

Peter Bogdanovich is an actor seem to run out of talent. Peter characters, Bogdanovich seems beautiful edges. In Paper Moon with hair like snakes and an pre-slavery Africa. And just Show when he reminisced about Madeline Kahn steals Peter's eleven-year-old Tatum O'Neal man-trapping. (Now you be in front with her big tits", she provided fine minutes but she totalled in the war. How do

Day of the jackel, Sheila Sleuth

There is no problem weighing Day of the Jackal against the admission. It's worth it, well worth it, despite its being another empty movie. (All the films reviewed today are empty, which is a suitable way to begin a season of reviewing: most movies are empty and to go to first-run films you have to discriminate in emptiness.) Day of the Jackal is a thriller, a 1973 suspense movie and it works like a clock. Meanwhile The Last of Sheila and Sleuth, two other new thrillers, fail miserably trying to revive the old whodunit convention.

The sixties somehow did change things. Not with the depth that many of us hoped and even believed, but with a sophistication that can't be reversed.

We weren't able to stop the Vietnam war, but we made it a flop. We took our toll on bingo, football, situation comedies. Certainly movies aren't as archly gamed up as they once were - which is what leaves Last of Sheila and Sleuth flopping around like beached fish. The great old ritual whodunits like Witness for the Prosecution, Third Man, Thirty-nine Steps needed to stand among the equally ritualized non-thrillers like Citizen Kane, Weekend at the Waldorf, His Girl Friday. Hitchcock's formalized shenanigans had to be prepared for with evenings of charades or mah-jong. Going to Sheila or Sleuth is like accepting an invitation to a costume party after you've learned that costumes don't help a party a bit. So James Mason or Laurence Olivier unravel the relatively ingenious plots. They unravel and unravel, but who really cares? Even the au courant touches (these movies were made recently), the bits of racism and hints of impotence in Sleuth, the very, very chic repartee in Sheila, belie rather than culminate, making the rest of the picture look even more dated and silly. (Lest everybody be tarred with the same brush, Dyan Cannon is very funny in Sheila and Michael Caine, in Sleuth is even more snively and hard to stomach than usual.)

But Day of the Jackals works. In 1962, the French Ministry of the Interior know that a rightwing military group is up to something, but they don't know what. So they kidnap one of its members and torture him until he reveals that a professional assassin, code-named Jackal, has been hired for a half-million dollars to kill DeGaulle. The minister sets the full resources of France to tracking him down.

It is hard to know how much Jackal has been helped by Watergate. I certainly would have treated as fictional its spy-girls, massive wire-tapping and great funds of illegally spent state money. (Not that I ever thought Nixon or DeGaulle were above such things; I just didn't realize they were competent and rich enough to pull it off.) But now, when the Jackal's chief hunter announces that he got information by tapping the phones of the top civil servants in the country, we don't even chuckle, we just take it in. Jackal works so well because at least one of its grotesque combatants (the state) is wholly credible.

Fred Zinneman has made Day of the Jackal so spare of image, and so straight-forward in its dialogue, that the odd baroque moment, like the Jackal's exploding a melon in a dry run of the assassination, echoes and echoes. (The assassination of the melon must be one of the grizzliest and most brilliant shots in the history of movies. You can't mistake that if you see it.) The film runs as if Zinneman had edited out almost everything he thought might date. When you consider Guns of Navarone, High Noon, The Sundowners and even some of Zinneman's relative failures like Behold a Pale Horse and A Man for All Seasons, the chances seem good that Day of the Jackal will age as well-even though it contains not a jot of meaning.

Vivaldi: The Four Seasons
Pinchas Zukerman, Violin and Conductor
English Chamber Orchestra
Columbia, $5.98

The Four Seasons, Vivaldi's most famous work, has unfortunately gained the reputation of a warhorse over the years, and has been put in the column marked "bore" by the musical elite.

This is unfortunate because these four violin concertos contain some of the composer's most melodically beautiful music, and like it or not, they've been a perpetual delight for hundreds of years. And luckily enough, being tagged a warhorse doesn't stop hundreds of thousands from discovering its beauty year after year.

Record companies are aware of this, and scarcely a year goes by when a new recording or two of the Seasons doesn't appear. Nearly every great violinist has given it a recorded try, and today some thirty are available. The newest recording, on Columbia, features the young Israeli violinist Pinchas Zukerman taking on the demanding assignment of soloist and conductor. The combination always runs the risk of being poorly coordinated. In the fast, difficult passages, there is always the danger that the soloist/conductor will have to pay so much attention to his fiddling that the orchestra's direction suffers.

Happily, that only happens once in this new recording. The slow movement (oddly enough) of the Spring concerto is plagued by an overloud cello. It might have been an oversight on Zukerman's part that this rather grating tone was allowed to get onto the final tape. Otherwise, it's a very fine recording, with lots of bite and drive in the English Chamber Orchestra's playing.

One reason for this is the witty and intelligent continuo playing provided by Philip Ledger. In baroque music, the continuo part was handled by a variety of instruments, principally the harpsichord. Ledger's keyboard word highlights the basic momentum of Vivaldi without getting in the way of the solo part.

In too many recordings of the Seasons, the harpsichord, if it is used at all, is buried in the back of the record. But the recorded sound of this whole ensemble is crisp and up-front, good enough for the most critical ears.

Zukerman, who is, after all, the star of the show, handles both roles with exhilarating ease. His tone is even and full and never seems to strain. It would be surprising if it did, because while the Seasons are difficult, they're a standard part of any violinist's concerto repertoire.

All in all, the record avoids both the shoals of an over-romantic approach and stays clear of the cold efficiency that the total-authenticity-in-performance-practice advocates call for. Sort of a Four Seasons for all seasons, to coin a cliché. A happy, cheerful winner of a record, it's also available in fourchannel stereo, although I haven't had a chance to hear it that way yet. If you don't have this music in your collection, it's a fine way to start.

Rites of Ron revealed

Inside Scientology
by Robert Kaufman
Olympia, $6.95

This book isn't as interesting as it sounds.

There's been a lot written and said about Scientology—it's become incredibly fashionable to smash it. Kaufman, a former member of the quasi-science-fiction religion, who rose to a high rank, smashes from inside.

Not that it doesn't deserve smashing; no doubt a good kick in the groin of Ron L. Hubbard (Scientology's founder) is a good idea every now and again.

But still a lot of things have been said about Scientology, that Kaufman's book simply repeats.

Scientology is billed as a supercharged key to success. It's the offshoot of something called dianetics, founded by former science-fiction writer Hubbard.

For some reason, Scientology caught on (the organization claims 15 million members all over the world).

The dramatic aspects about Scientology—their jargon; their critique of the mental health establishment; their paranoia about "wogs" (non-Scientologists) has already been documented.

So when Kaufman reports from his own reading, that Ron Hubbard thinks that giant gorillas operating eons ago caused the evils of this world, we're not surprised.

Nor are we shocked when he quotes a Hubbard memo stating that all enemies of Scientology are "fair game." They can be lied to, stolen from and eliminated. Heady stuff, but it's been said in other Scientology exposes.

The benefit of the Kaufman book is that it's a personal record-comparable to say the annals of a sailor travelling with Columbus to the America, or a homesteader in 18th century Upper Canada.

Step by step, Kaufman details how alienation from his everyday existence led him into Scientology; how Scientology drew him further and further into its own interpretation of reality; and finally, how at great strain, the author realized that he was being integrated not into life, but into murky self-deception.

The impression that Kaufman leaves you with is that Scientology doesn't count its adherents so much as permit them to con them themselves.

The question it leaves is why?

The Review section of The Varsity is looking for people who want to write about culture.

Culture is a pretty broad word - we not only need people to review books, movies, theatre, concerts, dance, records. We're also interested in articles that examine and analyse critically the institutions behind culture, the way it propagated and the way it affects people.

Original photography and graphic sketching is more than welcome.

If you're interested, drop in at 91 St. George St. (first floor) Monday at 1 pm.

Or leave your name.

This is a story about opera

As usual, the opening of the Music season in Toronto centers around the Canadian Opera Company. This year is special, though, because it's the company's big 25th anniversary season, with an unprecedented lineup of six operas over five weeks.

Leading off the extravaganza is the Canadian premiere of Wagner's Götterdämmerung, the climatic work in the composer's Ring cycle, and a gigantically difficult opera to perform. The prospects look good, though, because director Herman Geiger-Torel has lined up some impressive foreign talent for the demanding lead roles. Tickets are already at a premium as this is being written, so get there early for whatever rush seats may be left.

The first performance was on the 7th, but you can still catch it tomorrow and on the 20th.

If Wagner isn't quite your fare, and five hours is too much opera for you, there's also Fidelio, Beethoven's only opera, a stirring tale of a political prisoner and his wife's struggle to free him. Often banned in dictatorships, it's an impassioned cry for humanity and freedom. This was a huge success in 1970, the Beethoven Bicentennial year and is sure to be this year, too. Sept. 25 and five other performances.

Two for laughs are the Merry Widow, everybody's Viennese hum-along favourite, and Rossini's Barber of Seville, both in English. Again, these are returns of the Company's better shows, well worth the price of admission. They're especially good for the opera novice, because they're both in English, and not overloaded with the occasionally dull drama of grand opera, although the Rossini is quite fine, musically speaking. He wrote over 35 operas, and this is one of the handful that are still performed. To find out why, see it tomorrow afternoon or in one of the other four performances. As for Lehar's widowed bonbon, well, don't tell your culture-snob friends you're going, but go. It's really a lot of fun if you can ignore the thousands of little old ladies humming along with the big waltz. Sept. 18 and on and on and on.

There are two new productions as well, Verdi's Rigoletto and Heloise and Abelard by Canadian Charles Wilson. Considering the cost involved in staging a new opera today, especially one by a Canadian composer, the opera company really has to get top marks. It's on tonight and the 26th. The only opera sung in Italian this year is Verdi's, and it should be superb. Rigoletto has been a staple of this and all opera companies for ages. But this is a new production, with sets by Lawrence Schafer, who used to design for the Hart House theater. Louis Quilico, perhaps the best singer in the company, who is now a regular at the Metropolitan in New York, will play the Title character, and if he does as good a job as he has done before in the role, it will probably be the highlight of the season. See it Sept. 19 or in one of six other performances.

Unless you're deeply into Wagner, you probably won't enjoy the five-hour extravaganza that Götterdämmerung is. The comedies and Rigoletto are great for everyone, and you get a much tuller picture of Beethoven if you see Fidelio. As for Charles Wilson's new opera, it's bound to be an intriguing look at a true story from Medieval times, framed with demanding music.

As for me, I'll flip my opera cape over my shoulders and head down to O'Keefe Centre.

The Mind Benders

The Varsity—Michael Gouger

This man thinks this cellar will make art less pretentious

By TOM WALKOM

I rarely can understand reviews.

They often seem to be written in a language of their own, composed in an atmosphere that is inhabited by very special people — leading luminaries, maestros, artistes.

In reviews, publishers never sell books — the have "latest offerings". Concerts are "ambitious"; orchestras play "admirably".

When critics get enthusiastic over art, they experience raptures unknown to mortal men. And they're so... well, eloquent. "Could anything be cooler or more soothing than Morel's himmering pointillism and episodes of spun-out string and wind melody?" raved one music critic early this summer. "Even the metallic chord clusters and showers of notes that interrupted the predominantly lyrical mood, seemed to have a snow crystal quality."

To those of us wallowing in cultural illiteracy, that was like a message from another planet — the fact that it was incomprehensible established its worth.

"Wow," we grunted. "Sensitive stuff."

The mystique that surrounds art and artists, seemed an integral part of crative culture. Until I talked to an artist ...

"Pretentious," says Charlie Pachter. It's sunny in the back garden of his renovated open-space-concept home (the kind of house the Star writes about) deep in the heart of ethnic west-of-Bathurst Toronto.

Pachter's a Toronto painter and craftsman; art gallery types call him things like "a major younger artist" (he's 30).

We've just been discussing his plan to get together an artists' condominiumcum-workshop. He's the front man for a five-man syndicate that has just bought an old Ryerson St. warehouse (Queen and Bathurst).

The syndicate wants to renovate the building (now occupied by things like drape factories) into a place where artists can escape their own mystique.

The mystique irritates him. Actually it's not even their own, he says. It's been created for artists by a structure of dealers and critics, who want to invest both art and its producers with the fashionable appeal of an expensive commodity.

"Art has become a bourgeois artifact — a hedge against inflation, like real estate," he says.

What he means is that collecting art can be a good tax dodge for the wealthy. A collector can buy a painting for say $5,000 one year, and have it appraised for $50,000 in a couple of years. He then donates it to a gallery and claims a tax break of $50,000. If he's in the 50 per cent tax bracket, that's a net saving of $20,000. Good business.

"OK," says Pachter, warming up to his topic. "They pay more for your art, but they're not paying for the content — just the aura that surrounds it. So the more stylish you make your art and your artists, the more pretentious, the more status the work gets with the buyer."

"It's like diamonds or furs; pure snob appeal."

"Here's the way it works. Pachter breaks into pantomime. A collector comes into the dealer's shop and says 'I'd like to seem some of X's blobs'. So the dealer shows him some blobs, and the collector says he kind of likes the blue one."

"Right? Then it's pure flattery. The dealer steps back and he looks at the collector sideways and says 'Oh, you've got such good taste. I could tell you had excellent taste from the moment you walked in; his blue blobs are the best' — that sort of thing. The collector hems and haws and the dealer says 'But you know, it's not for sale; I'm so sorry'."

"So the collector goes away, but by this time, he'd give anything for the blue blob. A couple of weeks later, the dealer phones him up: 'Guess what? The original buyer has to sell, but he does want a little extra for his trouble — say an extra $10,000.'"

"That, by the way, is why art with content isn't in demand by collectors. Pure form — like a painting full of wavy lines — is easier to mystify."

Art retailers have an interest in keeping art stylish if that's what sells. After all, on the average they get 40 per cent of the sale price.

"So most artists don't have any other recourse," says Pachter. "They play along with the whole pretentious thing."

What Pachter wants to do with his old warehouse is create a place where serious artists can live and work together, in the hope that through mutual support, they'll counter the hype. It's called the Artists Alliance Building.

Specifies are vague. The sale has just been clinched, but the building won't be ready for full occupancy till the last garment mill moves out in 1975.

Maybe the syndicate will rent out studio and living space; maybe sell it in condominium fashion.

In the basement, Pachter wants to set up a Parisian-style bistro, where artists can sit around, relax and discuss their work.

(I'm beginning to feel the mystique again. Ernest Hemingway and F.Scott Fitzgerald sitting in a murky Parisian cafe. Memorable chit-chat. F.S.F.: "You know Ernest, the rich are different than you or I." E.H.: "Yes, Scot — they've got more money." Isn't it going to be a bit forced?)

"Definitely not," says Pachter. "It's just going to be a place where artists can grab a sandwich and a beer. That's all. There's no decent place to relax and do that in Toronto."

Maybe. "The idea of the Alliance is to have a place where we can keep the artist's life inviolate, where he's not at the mercy of the arbitrators of his life."

He looks around for an analogy. "It'll be like the same feeling you get on Spadina Ave. with the rag trade. Everyone's in the same craft and knows everyone else. Like on Spadina you walk down the street and people know each other and ask how they're doing; and the waitress in the delicatessen tells you when she's not feeling good and when the food's too awful to eat."

"It's more natural; it's a living and working environment."

One thing the Artists Alliance won't do is provide exhibiting space, at least not yet. That's a problem, because the retail end of art is the crux of the matter. If the artist still has to market his wares to satisfy the department of revenue and the latest fads, what difference is it that he's comfortable when he's working?

Pachter agrees. A drop in the bucket. "Yeah, but you know..." and he gives me that camp counsellor 'let's go gang' stare he used to use at Camp White Pine (when he was a counsellor). "It's a start, right?"

"Canadian artists are tremendously insecure — tremendously. And they feel constantly like they're competing against each other — they never get together." Because these chic dealers...?

"RIGHT" (That's it guys, balance the canoe on your shoulders') "When you're an artist you know that you've got to be more stylish than the next guy if you want to make it, because there can be only a few stylish paintings."

Supply and demand. If the art dealers create too many painters who are in vogue, the numerals on their price tags decrease. After all, status is having something no one else has. Like diamonds. South Africa has enough diamonds to fit the fingers of the world, but it releases just a few at a time — makes them more valuable.

So let the artists scramble; let them impress the collectors, the dealers, the exhibitors, with their sensitivity, their depth; let them emote. In the competition of the marketplace, cream (and dung) rise to the top. Paiman qui meruit ferat — those who make it have it made.

"Anyway," Pachter's talking about the Alliance again. "We think this will help provide each individual with the support of other artists living and working around him."

It's a good union tactic. When they're picking you off one by one, the first thing to do is stick together.

"And it just might make it; it just might."

When artists eat, they like to relax

Although most new works are not premiering until later in September there is still rich theatrical fare to be found in Toronto. For instance, John Guare's deeply involving black comedy "House of Blue Leaves" plays at the St. Lawrence Town Hall until September 29th. Alternating between zany farce and a kind of surrealistic satire on contemporary American life, the play makes us run the gambit of emotional reactions and then stuns with a surprise ending. A strong cast features Mia Anderson and Dawn Greenhaigh. Student rush tickets are $2.00.

The long awaited Two by Beckett are finally here. Hume Cronyn and Jessica Tandy hold the stage in monologue performances from "Krapp's Last Tape" and "Not I", Beckett's latest work. Last showing today at the St. Lawrence Centre with rush tickets at $2.00.

A gigantic switch from the language of Beckett is the language to be heard in an exciting new musical event in Toronto. "Malombo" features a South African duo from Pretoria who sing in the major South African languages and produce traditional tribal music loaded with jazz overtones. It opens September 16th at the Actor's Theatre, 390 Dupont St. Advance tickets are $2.50 at Third World Books, 748 Bay St. and the CODA Jazz and Blues Centre, 893 Yonge St. or $3.00 at the door.

And if that isn't enough there are currently four Revues playing in Toronto each with their own satirical "Dames At Sea" at Theatre-In-The-Dell on Simcoe Street spoofs 1930's musicals while "Se- cond City" Revue has already been operating for some weeks in Toronto and promises to become a permanent adjunct to our more traditional stagecraft. Developed by a Chicago's troupe of the same name, the Toronto franchise operation of the same name performs an ongoing show. Although lacking a hard-edged satirical bite as yet, "Second City" takes off on everything from the nuclear family to funeral parlours and the glib fifties hot-rod scene. Student prices are $2.50 and there is free admission to improvisational sessions at 11:00 p.m. Tues. Wed. Thurs. and Sun. and on Sat. at 1:00 a.m. Finally Harold's Stage Door at the Regency Towers Hotel is staging something called "For Piano, Drums and Violence". Styled as a new comedy revue with music it is apparently a satire on cruelty which becomes a homage to violence. This entertainment plays Tuesday to Saturday at 9:00 and plans to stay until people have had enough. Student tickets are $2.00. Have fun.

If you can spare the time next Thursday (the 20th) there's a concert planned out at Humber College. Centered around Humber's excellent Studio 1 Jazz Orchestra, the concert will feature the ubiquitous Moe Koffman, making a rare daytime appearance away from the television studios.

Humber College runs a music program that is unique in the city, concentrating on jazz and fields of music not covered by U of T's more traditional music faculty. York's music program is less traditional, but it seems Humber goes for the least formal approach. The program hasn't been around for all that long, and this concert will be the first chance for the general public to hear what it's been working on. Tony Mergel, conductor of the jazz orchestra, hopes to have more programs throughout the year, featuring students as well as the city's well-known jazz luminaries.

Humber is quite a distance, from here located west off Hwy. 27 north of Rexdale. The concert is in the lecture hall, and should be worth the drive out.

The only new addition to Toronto's music emporiums over the summer was the opening of Egertons. It's a restaurant during the day that masquerades as a coffeehouse at night when it features local folk acts. The operation, located at 70 Gerrard Street, East at Church, started out offering its entertainment free, but there's a new policy that requires you pay a $1 cover charge, some of which can go towards the food, (which includes such gourmet favourites as stew, and spaghetti). Egertons does have the advantage of a liquor license (draught beer and wine) and more roominess than any of its competitors. Music this weekend is supplied by Bruce Miller. For more info call 668-0036 (the hot apple pie with ice cream isn't bad).

The Riverboat coffeehouse, 134 Yorkville (922-6216) doesn't always have the best entertainment going (the best Americans usually play there when they come to the city though) but the admission is consistently high. ($3.50). John Harold, formerly with The Greenbriar Boys, and the Honkeys will be dishing out the blue grass tonight through Sunday. John Hammond, the blues artist who was a big favourite at the Mariposa Folk festival this summer, opens on Tuesday.

When reading about the military takeover in Chile in the daily press keep a couple of things in mind:

1. Both the Star and the Globe and Mail get their Chilean news from American wire service. The Star uses Chicago Sun-Times (check the credit on the bottom of their Special to the Star stories); the Globe uses Reuter, Associated press and the New York Times services.

Americans tend to be more paranoid about socialism and social democracy than Canadians, who at least have the NDP. They don't even have medicare.

So when you read about the showdown between Allende and democracy, take it with a grain of salt.

2. The press describes the Chilean coup as the product of a middle-class revolt. In Canada, where most people at least think they're middle-class, that's tantamount to saying popular revolt.

But you never see authoritative figures in the daily press on the relative size of Chile's middle-class. Is it 70 per cent of the populace? 50 per cent? five per cent?

3. It's often pointedly noted that although Allende was elected democratically, it wasn't by a majority; he polled only 36.3 per cent of the popular vote.

True, Pierre Trudeau became prime minister of this country in 1972 with 38.3 per cent of the popular vote. Even in his 1968 sweep, Trudeau picked up only 45 per cent of the popular vote.

So if a minority government justifies a military takeover, the Liberals had better start digging tank traps along highway 17 between Ottawa and Camp Petawawa.

Students like new Scar credit system

Students at Scarborough College appear to be taking advantage of the college's experimental credit system approved by Governing Council last spring after several months of committee debate.

Under the credit system, there is no official distinction between full-time and part-time students since any student may take as many courses as she or he wished, either during the day or in the evening. Some courses formerly taught during the day are being given exclusively in the evening and during registration several former part-time students opted for day-only courses.

Students interviewed during the registration sessions last week indicated they would take advantage of the increased flexibility and many planned to take four or six courses this year instead of the usual five. Regulations for the fifteen and twenty-course degrees remain similar to the rules governing degrees on the other two campuses.

Scarborough Principal D. R. Campbell, a strong supporter of the credit system, thinks the full impact of the new arrangements won't be felt until next summer.

Interviewed earlier this week, Campbell said that many students "wanted to take courses during the summer but since the system was approved so late in the spring, they had already made plans to work."

The credit system puts Scarborough on what is effectively a trimester schedule since many of the College's courses are of the half-year variety.

Campbell indicated that "very substantial" enrolments were expected for the 1974 summer session both at the College itself and at Durham College in Oshawa.

Campbell added that the unusually long lineups and lengthy delays that marred registration at Scarborough this year should not really be blamed on the new system, but were an unavoidable result of the delays in gaining final approval from the Governing Council last spring.

"Students were able to pre-register in most courses but the fees forms could not be prepared in advance since students must pay on a per-course basis when they finally decide on their course load. Thus, students could not pay in advance this year and we did have some delays in collecting the fees but that will be cured in time for next year."

Campbell, who became principal last year, is better known on the St. George campus as the author of the liberal 1969 report on discipline that has been reversed in the controversial new code of behaviour.

The combination of the credit system and fewer prerequisites has created problems for some departments in attempting to estimate their full-course equivalent (FCE) enrolment for the coming year.

Student preferences as of mid-August indicate 29.4 percent of the total FCE will be in the humanities, 30.6 in the social sciences and 40.3 in science; the percentages are roughly similar to last year's in all three cases.

Campbell had expected a slight increase in summer enrolment and again without final figures, it appears that about 714 students attended either day or evening classes compared to 510 last year. The figures do not include 195 students registered with the university's department of extension.

Some significant changes in student preference are noticeable from the summer enrolments and fall term preferences. For example, biology has risen to 10 percent of the college's total FCE compared to 7.3 percent two years ago while English has fallen to 9.0 percent from 11.9 percent and Sociology to 8.2 percent from 11.1 percent.

One final feature of the credit system has caused no delays and received no criticism. Scarborough no longer has to receive permission for its academic innovations from the Arts and Science Council.

Both students and teaching staff have welcomed the long-awaited academic independence from the controversial Arts Council, in stage for several bitter battles in recent years between some teaching staff clinging to their former dominance and privileges and students pressing for parity on the Council.

Student pressure forces prices down at Scar

The first week of classes still isn't over and already at least one college administration has been forced to back down in the face of angry students and a militant students' council.

Food prices at Scarborough College, which had climbed by almost 25 per cent in two stages since May, will be reduced within the next few days, responding to pressure exerted on the administration by the Scarborough College Students' Council.

"The prices are coming down, that's for sure," said SCSC President

Ross Flowers yesterday following a meeting with some members of the administration and representatives of Commercial Caterers, which holds the catering contract.

Flowers, last year's SAC vice-president, said that it is immaterial whether or not the college could justify the higher prices.

"I can appreciate the financial plight facing the college but students simply cannot afford to pay the ridiculously high prices they are charging. Reductions are inevitable."

The Student Council plastered the College this week with posters advertising lower prices for milk, coffee, tea, soft drinks and sandwiches at the SCSC operated coffee shop and had planned to add several additional food items and increase its advertising pressure on the College cafeteria.

The expansion of the student food will continue regardless of any reduction in cafeteria prices, Flowers said.

"We welcome any reductions the administration may make, but I still believe that students and teaching staff should have a choice in menus, prices, and the environment in which they choose to eat. What's wrong with a little friendly competition?"

As of yesterday, the student coffee shop was undercutting the administration by five cents on tea and soft drinks, up to 15 cents on milk, and by as much as 30 cents on sandwiches.

In addition to the effective expansion of its coffee shop, the SCSC organized four new student services, and totally renovated and repainted the Scarborough Pub which it operates in the College's new recreation wing.

A five-cents-per-copy duplicating service appears to be taking business away from the photocopiers operated by the college library.

After delays caused by lengthy renovations and licensing regulations, a used book-store, typing room and tuck shop will all open Monday, Flowers said.

Fired math profs denied appeal

By BOB BETTSON

All 11-day occupation of mathematics department offices last spring had no effect on the rehiring of a mathematics instructor who was fired and two professors who were denied tenure. This summer, the appeals of the three math teachers were denied.

Erindale professor Michael Mather was advised by U of T President John Evans that a special review committee considering his appeal this summer found that he was "competent but not outstanding in teaching and research."

He was also told that his research lacked the "academic excellence" to merit tenure. After he leaves U of T in December Mather plans to write a book based on his research.

One of the reasons for the denial given by the committee was alleged "unsolicited complaints" from his students. However Mather stated that the only evaluations done of his courses were favorable.

Former U of T math professor David Spring, also denied tenure, was told last spring he would be granted an appeal but was not given one. Evans told him in a letter that because he had submitted his resignation last November it would be a "dangerous precedent" to grant an appeal.

Spring is teaching this year in Paris on a one-year contract, but with the tenure denials both will have a hard time getting another job, according to Mather. "We are effectively kicked out of careers as teachers in Canada," he added.

Like Mather, Spring was told that the denial of tenure was because of the "limited extent" and "small volume" of published work.

Stephen Salaff fired from his part-time position as a math instructor was refused a hearing about his dismissal by Arts and Science Dean Bob Green. Greene informed him on April 3 that there was "no substance" to his charge of discrimination.

Salaff charged last spring during the occupation that a dispute over grading with another professor in which Salaff had taken the side, of students was responsible for his firing. Another math professor agreed then that Salaff was a good teacher but he was not in tune with the spirit of "collegiality" within the department.

Salaff commented that "though they think they have dispensed justice, they haven't addressed the basic demands of the students during the occupation."

Landlord uses minor renovation as rent hike excuse

By CHRIS PROBERT
A landlord in at least one area of the city is using minor renovations as an excuse for increasing rents in older apartment buildings.

Fifteen tenants at 5 Earl Street near Jarvis and Wellesley were given eviction notices by a company called Venture Properties Ltd. at 10:30 p.m., August 31, at the beginning of the long Labour Day Weekend. The reason was to facilitate "extensive renovations." Tenants were paying about $130 a month for bachelor apartments.

An extension of a week to 10 days has since been given to tenants who were unable to find new accommodation, but one tenant called the extension "not overgenerous."

The deed to 5 Earl Street is in the name of Albert Schillinger, of Thorncliffe Park Drive, who bought the property for $192,000 on April 19 of this year. Nevertheless, the evictions were by Venture Properties Ltd. The president of Venture Properties is H. Joseph Valevicius (sometimes known as Joseph Valius).

The North Jarvis Community Association is holding a public meeting at 8 p.m. on Tuesday, September 18, at Jarvis Collegiate (Jarvis and Wellesley) in the cafeteria to discuss possible action by the tenants.

A similar situation took place at 3

Meredith Crescent, an eight apartment house in south Rosedale. On June 1 the house was supposed to be sold to a Dr. Giddings. However, Dr. Giddings was allegedly unable to close the deal. The property was thus taken over by the same Valevicius as on Earl Street. In this case Valevicius had been acting as the real estate broker.

On July 30 tenants received a letter informing them of rent increases as of September 1. Tenants were told the increases were to cover the costs of extensive renovations but, according to tenant Al Eaglesham, the renovations were minor. The porch was painted, and new carpeting and wallpaper were laid down. Rents were increased by at least 75 per cent, in one case from $160 to $285 per month. The Meredith Crescent tenants were given one day to give notice if they decided to move out.

From figures supplied by Valevicius himself and the Land Transfer Tax Department at Queen's Park, a tenant in the Meredith Crescent house has calculated that Valevicius makes about 65 per cent on his capital investment as well as increasing his equity in the property by about 30 per cent annually.

Still other properties may be involved. There are two mortgages on the Earl Street building. One dates from the time of the sale to Schillinger, but there is a second, for $250,000 arranged with Second City Financial Corporation, using 5 Earl Street and three other properties as collateral—317 and 433 Sherbourne Street, and 32 Roxborough East. Joan Doiron, of Downtown Action Project, has been unable to further connect the owners of these other properties to Venture Properties.

Blues mixing youth and experience

Can Blues blend their large crop of rookies with their experienced ball players fast enough to produce a winner this season? Monday's 35-10 win over Carleton Ravens provides convincing evidence that they can.

Fast seasons have depended on the passing arm of Varsity's veteran Wayne Dunkley, three times OUA and once all-Canadian quarterback. This year the offensive backfield is more rounded with a potent running threat in Cor Doret, Blues top scorer last year, and Libert Castillo. Rookie Bob Hedges, who drove through for two touchdowns against Carleton will also add to the veterans' punch. The addition of the running game can only make Dunkley's passing more potent, especially with Doret and Castillo in the backfield, and speedy Brent Elsey at flanker.

The offensive line will have a tough time proving itself because of its small size although good speed helps to compensate for a 200-pound player average. Bruce Parrack won an all-star spot on guard last year, while centre Jim Nicoletti has switched from end with the graduation of all-star Rein Enno.

Dave Quick brings two years to his tackle spot, but Nick Grittani and Charlie Wright are starters for the first time. The offensive line's lack of weight and experience could prove to be the team's weakness, especially if injuries hit hard.

The defensive line is heavier with a 220 average, but even more inexperienced in previous intercollegiate play. Only Dave Flavell, a transfer from McGill, and Walt Dudar have first-string intercollegiate play behind them. Injuries could also play a large role here.

Small speedy linebackers provide the experience for the defensive team. Hartley Stern captains the defense in his final year of intercollegiate football, with Harry Mellon, Chris Sammut, and probably Rick Nakatsu, backing him. Powerful performances from this unit effectively smothered any offence the Ravens could muster in the season opener.

The defensive backfield suffered a blow with the transfer of stand-out Peter McNabb, but other transfers in compensated handsomely. Greg Pleyley from Waterloo Warriors, Ron Raine from Laurier and London Lords, and Don Page from McMaster join Doug Ball and Rick Jeyman in a diminutive 170 pound average but very fast defensive unit. This crew will produce plenty of turnovers against a passing team.

Kicking specialist Don Thomson returns from a good season in 1971 to add power to the offence.

At this point it's difficult to judge how well Blues can make up for their lack of size by speed and versatility. Their balanced ground-air game against Carleton promises well, but inexperience and size in the line could deflate it very quickly.

Ottawa Gee Gees look to be the favourites in the East, and their size will be the test for Varsity to overcome. Coach Ron Murphy exudes confidence that he can take the team all the way to the CIAU title. Blues have the cohesion and the determination to do it, if they can outlast the bigger teams they meet along the route.

The second season game is against York at CNE stadium at 2 tomorrow. York used to be easy pickings, but perhaps Nobby Wirkowski has ended those days and the game could generate plenty of offence.

What U of T team has the longest winning record? Women's field hockey has won 11 Ontario titles in a row. The team (above) starts working on its 12th title Saturday in City league competition.

Sailors try for repeat win

The U of T sailing team travelled many thousands of miles last year to win the Canadian Intercollegiate Sailing Association championship. The season climaxed in June in Fort Worth, Texas, when the team represented Toronto for the first time ever in the North American title.

The team scored notable success in both fall and spring seasons last year. The team of John Lazier, Richard Zimmerman, Charlie Colman and Joanna Kidd won the annual "Hudson International" trophy in Detroit this fall.

Spring season featured the CICSA spring title, initiated by the U of T two years ago. Again Toronto won, with the team of Lazier, Kathleen Muir, Ian Brown, and Tom Kennedy narrowly beating out RMC. Then it was on to Fort Worth, with Lazier and Brown as skippers and Chris Hains and Lou Odette crewing.

One other event started by the U of T in the spring was a single-handed championship in Laser class boats. This proved so popular that it will feature in every fall regatta; so

U of T students with access to Lasers are encouraged to try their skill.

The fall season starts tomorrow at Kingston, hosted by Queen's. Regattas will be held almost every weekend in November, ending in the Canadian championships in Kingston, hosted by RMC. Most of last year's title winners will be back again to strive for even greater victories. The team always welcomes fresh blood; so if you're interested call Lazier, fleet commodore (928-3282), or Brown (278-8848).

If you're less interested in competition but love sailing for pleasure, information will be available in Hart House on Tuesday, September 18 from 12 to 2 P.M.

Info bites dust

U of T Info, a computer information system which has already cost $4,500, will not be put into widespread use this year, the SAC executive decided yesterday.

The project was designed to make available to members of the university information about events and organizations on campus and in the city. Anyone wishing to use the system would have gone either to one of the computer terminals, or to a "viewcom" unit set up in Sidney Smith Hall. Typing a simple code would then put the user in touch with the information required.

U of T Info manager Peter Gribble had hoped to have the system operating within a month. He also expected that it would "desensitize" people to the use of computers.

The project ran into trouble during the summer, when advertising revenue which was to pay for the system never materialized. The advertising manager, whom Gribble described as "inefficient and incompetent," was fired in August by the SAC executive.

SAC president Bob Anderson hopes that the system of computer information will be put into use next year.

AS for now, the $80 a month (plus insurance) "viewcom" unit will be returned to its owner, Bell Canada Ltd.

Erindale expands its basketball programme this fall in a drive to produce an OUA-calibre contender. Mike Lavelle, director of student affairs, and director of athletics Dave Crichton are combining as they did at Waterloo University to bring a last place team to within two points of the all-Ontario championships. Lavelle has a long record of building winning teams from scratch and could possibly have Erindale challenging the Blues sooner than anyone expects... Rugged Blues start the season with an exhibition game Sunday on the back campus at 2:00. This year the Blues will have three teams in competition... Clinics are making the scene again for interfaculty athletes and officials. An international referee will conduct rules clinic for interfac officials. An international referee will conduct a rules clinic for interfac officials Wednesday, September 19, at 7:00 pm in the Intramural Committee Room. Lacrosse fiends get their chance Thursday, September 27, at 7:30 in the main gym for a skills and rules clinic... Varsity has too little space to publicize all the myriad sports and recreation activities available to men and women on campus. For women, the athletic office in the Benson building (928-3441) is the place; for men, the interfaculty office in Hart House (928-3082).

Bureau threatened

The U of T Advisory Bureau, a loosely structured student counselling service, will have to shut down early in the school year unless alternate funding is found.

The bureau, which has been operating since 1965, had its $85,000 budget slashed last spring by $22,000. The decision was made by the Governing Council's budget subcommittee, meeting in camera, without any warning given to the bureau. Ninety per cent of the bureau's operating budget goes toward salaries, and little trimming can be done without laying off staff and creating unnecessary tensions, says the bureau's director, Don McCulloch.

The bureau's immediate plan to compensate for budget cuts is to bill various university departments for services such as teaching assistance, which the bureau previously rendered free of charge. This would merely funnel money from one area of the university to another.

Attempts are being made to have the original decision reversed. A task force on student services, set up this spring by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee, made a strong recommendation to the budget committee to restore the bureau's full budget.

The bureau is also looking to Metro for funds, a move approved in principle by the City-U of T Liaison Committee, which is attempting to foster closer links between the university and the community. McCulloch notes that the bureau provides services to many people who are not university students.

The bureau also provides university-related services to the community. Last year it sponsored a joint program with the Toronto Board of Education training high school teachers to give family life and sex education courses.

Work done by the bureau resulted in the creation of the Campus Legal Aid Centre and the Student Health Organization which is involved with the Alexander Park Clinic on Augusta Street.

Now the bureau is carrying on as usual in their offices at Spadina and Harbord above the Royal Bank, and is open to suggestions for special projects from student groups.

Currently, McCulloch is trying to get more work done in the paramedical field. He would like to see people meet with doctors and health staff to gain more understanding of their bodies, and be less awed by elementary medical procedures.

If this student looks confused, it's because the damn machine's a lemon.

Innis project innovative

By MARINA STRAUSS

In a spirit of community and celebration, Innis College marked the construction of its first permanent home by a ceremonial sod-turning last Friday.

The $12 million complex to be built across from the Robarts Library on Sussex Street is the first project of such size in Toronto to integrate existing houses into a new structure. It was designed by architects Jack Diamond and Barton Myers.

The complex will consist of three three-storey buildings, two of them new. It will house the College's administrative and faculty offices, lecture halls and seminar rooms, student common rooms and a student pub. An expansive grass courtyard will lie in the centre, an open terrace will be on the roof.

A crowd of about 250, including Innis College members, prominent figures of the university, and present Sussex Street residents, watched as university president John Evans, the college's first principal Robin Harris, present principal Peter Russell, and college student council president Shelley Sinuk of turned the loosened sod. The college sponsored a bar-b-que and streetdance with two bands afterwards.

Harris, speaking before turning the sod, stressed the importance in the project's development of "students operating in a parity situation".

He pointed out that the College's policy "certainly involves students very heavily".

The building committee was composed of students, faculty, and administration. A better building resulted because of student input, Harris claimed.

Harris said he was relieved original plans were scrapped in 1968 for a $8 million building with two towers taller than the Robarts

Library. "It would have been out of step with the times", he affirmed.

"The delay," he said, "has forced the college to develop its spirit". Later he added, "you need people, you don't need a building".

The experimental college has been housed in temporary quarters on 63 St. George Street since its founding in 1964.

In an interview, project architect Diamond was quick to emphasize that the plan's unique aspect is in its modesty.

"Communication with the community was an integral factor in the designing," said Diamond. The plan will rehabilitate all other existing houses on the block, mostly for residential accommodations.

"We were not trying to compete with surrounding buildings," Diamond said. "We were trying to be a complement to the community". The building, scheduled to be in use by next September, will be open to the public.

"It's the opposite of Massey College," Diamond claimed. "Why have you never been to Massey College?" he asked. "It's got a wall around it. It's an elitist enclave".

"The Innis complex is not a secluded monastic garden," he continued. "It's open and welcoming".

Diamond pointed out the function of the complex's "Town Hall", a big circular hall with a podium in the centre.

"The Town Hall is a community centre in all senses", Diamond emphasized. "It's a meeting place, a discussion place. People can just go and have lunch there, like on the Spanish steps".

Built for film screenings in mind, the hall can be adapted for council meetings, lectures, and theatre.

Innis College still has one pitfall to cross before building can get under way in December.

The architects hope to secure

Pres. John Evans and others turn the turf for the new Innis project at Friday's shindig special permission from City Council to build in line with the existing houses on the block. A zoning-by-law stipulates that buildings must be set back further than the existing houses. This, Diamond said, would destroy the physical harmony of the street.

Diamond confirmed that student input to the project was "very worthwhile and really helpful".

"I got a great deal out of it. Many changes were made because of users' views".

Innis College will set up a non-profit corporation to lease from the university and renovate 11 existing houses on Sussex Street, adjoining the complex numbers 4 to 24, and 375 Huron Street, for low-cost housing.

Residents already living on the site who wish to be part of the project will have first priority to the 110 places Innis College presently has 87 places in its co-operatives.

The Campus Co-operative Day Care Centre, already at 12 Sussex, will move into 14 Sussex as well, if it can afford it.

The Innis Community Corporation, as it will be called, will aim for a ratio of two-thirds of the accommodations to be for Innis College students, and the balance to be for families and non-students. This, however, is subject to controls by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, to which the Corporation will apply for a loan.

In her proposal for the housing project, residence co-ordinator

Laura Radbury outlined the Co-op's desires to become part of the existing community and not to dislocate residents who now live on the site.

People in the area bounded by Spadina, Bloor, St. George, and Harbord have long resented intrusions by the university's expansion plans. The latest conflict, in 1970, arose over construction of the air-conditioning plant on the southeast corner of Sussex and Spadina.

Before he helped to officially turn the pro-turned sod Friday night, Russell summed up his feelings:

"It was my dream that we have a building that will not attack the neighborhood but make it a better one for it."

Crown Trust director on Gov Council

One of the provincial appointees to the Governing Council, W.J.D. Lewis may have a conflict of interest.

Lewis, chairman of the Planning and Resources committee, was appointed in 1972, according to the Financial Post's 1972 Directory of Directors, to the board of directors of Crown Trust Ltd., which manages about 90 U of T owned houses in the northwest part of the St. George Campus.

Lewis maintained that Crown Trust had been acting as rental agent for several years. He added that planning for the future use of the houses was a shared responsibility with the Business and Internal Affairs Committees of the council.

K.S. Gregory, administrative assistant for property relations, said that Crown Trust was acting as rental agent because "they're the professionals".

There have been recent complaints from student tenants of Crown Trust managed houses of high rental fees, unreasonable profits by middlemen, and unexpected notices to vacate.

Lewis, a Conservative party member, is now president of Canadian operations of the Prudential Insurance Company of America.

Crown Trust has been the beneficiary in an arrangement in which the University expropriates or buys up homes in the north west area of the campus and either turns them over to Crown Trust or uses them itself.

Houses are allowed to deteriorate with only minimum maintenance by Crown Trust's repair crews. No improvements are made. A spokesman said in 1972 that it would be useless to improve the houses because they will be coming down in the near future.

Under the agreement, which dates back to 1957, Crown Trust pays the university three per cent of the gross net income minus the maintenance costs.

There are no set leases despite tenants' protests and the houses are rented month to month. This allows evictions on one month's notice, as several students found who were evicted from two Sussex St. houses recently.

Another problem is Crown Trust's rental to middlemen, absentee landlords who raise the rent higher. These middlemen are allowed to live rent free and maintenance free collecting sizable profits.

Crown Trust had promised to rent directly but, as in the case of negotiations over longer term leases, has proved unresponsive to resident demands.

Vacancies are often not advertised but filled by people having contacts in the area, allowing absentee landlords to enlarge their holdings.

Chile petition

A petition is being circulated by the Latin American Working Group to be sent to Prime Minister Trudeau.

The petition reads in part: "We strongly urge you condemn the arbitrary military measures against the democratically elected government of President Salvador Allende."

The petition will be available at the SAC office, 12 Hart House Circle.

LAWG is also sponsoring a "Chile Fund". Contributions should be sent to LAWG Chile Fund, Box 6300, Station A, Toronto 1, Toronto.

Groups working for rent control

Last Thursday, the Metro Toronto Rent Control Committee began regular meetings at City Hall after a summer slump, and is organizing strategy for the coming year.

The committee which plans to organize tenants around the issue of rent control was set up last spring with the support of various organizations including the Parkdale Tenants Association, the Ontario Anti-Poverty Organization, the Labour Council, and Corra. As well they had the support of some City Hall alderpersons: such as Dorothy Thomas, Dan Heap, and D'Arcy Goldrick.

The major accomplishment of the committee so far was to hold a Metro-wide meeting at the St. Lawrence Centre mid-June.

The group wants to organize pressure, first on the borough and Metro levels, and then move on to press Queen's Park for appropriate rent control legislation.

The committee will begin contacting people who came to earlier rent control meetings, who will in turn begin contacting and organizing tenants.

The committee will also research the problem of how rent control could best be implemented.

The tenant movement in Toronto has so far been fractured and divided, and generally limited to individual buildings or areas.

In 1969, the Metro Tenants' Association and the Ontario Tenants' Association grew out of mergers of smaller tenant organizations to force Queen's Park to reform the Landlord and Tenant Act. The Ontario Law Reform Commission had recommended changes in the act in 1968, but the province had been dragging its feet.

When Queen's Park suddenly and unexpectedly made changes to the act, the umbrella tenant organizations disintegrated.

However, tenants now make up more than half the population of Toronto, and in the face of increasing rents and accommodation crises, the Metro Rent Control Committee hopes to organize support for some kind of controls on escalating shelter costs.

NOMINATIONS

In the near future, the Academic Affairs Committee will be considering the membership of its three standing sub-committees — Admissions and Awards, Curriculum and Standards, and Library and also the membership of the Committee for Honorary Degrees. The Chairman of the Academic Affairs Committee would welcome suggestions from members of the University community for the membership of these bodies.

Nominations, including a brief resume of the candidates' qualifications should be sent to Miss Marie Salter, Secretary, Academic Affairs Committee, Office of the Governing Council, Room 106, Simcoe Hall, University of Toronto, as soon as possible, but in any case no later than Tuesday, September 25th, 1973.

Chile's business is ours: US

"The Nixon administration is a business administration. Its business is to protect American business," Secretary of State William Rogers told a group of US businessmen with Chilean interests in 1971.

And the US government has tried hard to protect its companies in the first Latin American country to elect a Marxist president. Its hands are not clean when it comes to the Sept. 11 military coup in Chile.

The Chilean military seized control supposedly to end the economic crisis facing the country. Thousands have been killed in fighting throughout the country, as the military junta attempts to eradicate any people associated with the former president.

The coup was not unexpected in Washington, as government officials admitted last week. The US promoted the coup through its overt economic boycott of Chile and through its covert aid to the right wing and military groups, which laid the groundwork for civil war.

Before Allende and his Unidad Popular party came to power in 1970, many Chilean industries were owned by foreign mostly American interests. Total US investment was one billion dollars, $700 million of it in the lucrative copper mines. Major investors included Anaconda, Kennecott, and ITT&T.

As in Canada, essential industries were foreign-controlled. Sixty per cent of the chemical and metal production industries, 50 per cent of the shoe productions were non-Chilean.

With the unanimous support of the Chilean Congress, the Allende government nationalized American-owned copper holdings. It cited poor conditions in the mines and high profits the companies made during the 1960's — 25 per cent on invested capital in most years — as the reason for no compensation. Other US investments were bought out.

The US feared Chile's action would encourage similar actions in neighboring countries, threatening further American activity in Latin America. Preventing this seemed important to policy makers in 1971 because of rising competition from western Europe and Japan for the world's raw materials and market.

A headline policy drawn up and announced by President Richard Nixon on Jan. 19, 1972, included cutting Chile off from private and public credit sources to prevent the country from buying needed goods, many of which were available only from the States.

During the past 20 years, Chile has imported 60 per cent of its capital goods from the States and all those function on US-made parts. Chile could not obtain them or medical supplies, fertilizers, etc.

The US government also refused to renegotiate Chile's huge foreign debt, giving it a bad credit rating around the world.

The Chilean military, long a stomping ground of non-Allende supporters, was given $14.5 million in credit in 1971, and 1972, after the blockade began, compared to the approximate $800,000 it received in

The American policy was agreed on by top members of the Nixon administration, many of whom were former bankers like John H. Hennessey of the Treasury Dept. He apparently made policy toward Chile in 1971-72. Secretary of State William Rogers met with representatives of Anaconda, Ford and ITT and banking interests, in October 1971 shortly after Allende's announced compensation would not be made to copper companies. He assured them the US would "cut off aid unless she provided prompt compensation."

The plan, as it appeared, was to cut Chile off from much-needed money. Imports would be cut off, leading to shortages and an economic crisis to lay the ground for a military takeover. The takeover could be rationalized by blaming the Allende government for the economic problems.

A secret memo reported by columnist Jack Anderson in the Washington Post March 28, 1972, quoted American Ambassador to Chile, Nathaniel Davis, as saying the Chilean people would not accept military intervention until their economic situation was desperate.

While the overt acts of a blockade were progressing, the US, through the CIA, worked on right wing Chileans and the military.

The CIA was authorized by the National Security Council to spend $400,000 in 1970 for covert propaganda acts, according to information released during the ITT hearings.

$400 collected for Chile committee

Enrique Neuburg, a Chilean graduate student in Chemical Engineering at the U of T, called on all groups and individuals interested in the defense of Chile against the military junta, to join the Canadian Committee for Solidarity with a Democratic Chile.

His speech, in Spanish and English, was a main feature of a meeting last Saturday called by the Canadian Peace Congress (CPC) at the Unitarian Church near St. Clair and Avenue Road. It was attended by about 400 people.

The meeting was described by one speaker, the reverend John Morgan, national chairman of the Canadian Peace Congress, as a memorial to Salvador Allende, the dead president of the over-thrown government in Chile.

Speakers representing various groups, John Sewell from City Council, Father Gregory Baum of St. Michael's College, and Bill Longbridge of the Metro Toronto Labour Council—discussed the bloody military coup of September 11 in Chile, and pledged support the new defense committee.

Poems of Pablo Neruda, Chilean Communist poet and Nobel Prize winner, were read and sung by folk singer Perry Friedman.

Ten members from the Communist Party of Canada (Marxist-Leninist) (CPC-ML), which is Maoist inspired, tried to disrupt the meeting when John Morgan began his address. Amid shouts of "the Canadian Peace Congress has no right to hold this meeting," and "down with revisionism and trotskysm", a fight broke out in which some glass doors were broken and two people were sent to hospital.

Rae Stevenson, executive member of the Peace Congress shouted out from the podium that "these people (the assembly) are not concerned listening to CIA-inspired junk" and the disrupters were removed from the hall.

Toward the end of the meeting, a resolution was unanimously passed, condemning the military junta's illegal and unconstitutional seizure of power and calling upon the Canadian government not to recognize the military dictatorship.

After the meeting was officially adjourned with the singing of the Chilean national anthem, Varda Kidd, a member of the Revolutionary Marxist Group, announced a campus meeting for today at one o'clock in Sid Smith foyer. (The meeting has the support of several groups including SAC, the Revolutionary Marxist Group and the young socialists.) While she was attempting to motivate her support of the Chilean revolution, she was booed down and the microphone was disconnected.

Four hundred dollars was collected for the newly-formed Canadian Committee for Solidarity for Democratic Chile, which was organized last week on the initiative of the Chilean students at the University of Toronto.

Someone offered to pay for the broken doors. In memory of Allende.

5,000 Chileans dead

A report from Prensa Latina news service Thursday night said that there had been over 5,000 deaths in Santiago. The same report said that 80,000 workers had barricaded themselves in factories in the industrial belt around Santiago, and that they were under attack by planes and artillery. Five hundred workers in the Sumar Textile Plant reportedly died in a bombing raid late Thursday.

There were fewer reports Friday of developments in Chile. Interpress Services, now broadcasting from Argentina, said that early Friday morning it was possible to pick up some broadcasts from clandestine stations, but that the broadcasts were short and infrequent.

One broadcast, IPS said, indicated that combat was increasing near the centre of the city and the forces of the Popular Unity Movement still controlled the industrial outskirts around Santiago, despite the heavy bombing.

At four o'clock Friday morning another underground broadcast indicated that the army had arrested hundreds of men and women and concentrated them in two large stadiums, where mass celebrations used to take place during Allende's government.

Although no reports were received concerning how the workers fighting against the junta were organized, a Prensa Latina report indicated that since the attempted coup last June, industrial workers' commands have been activated and new ones organized in Santiago.

Workers in the industrial belt in Santiago had begun to manufacture all kinds of homemade weapons, including mortars, fragmentation grenades, crude rifles, etc. The workers also said they were in possession of large quantities of dynamite.

Amaze your friends

Does the idea of standing in a trenchcoat with a press card stuck in your fedora befuddling minor officials with your pointed questions appeal to you? Is Clark Kent your secret hero? Or even Jimmy Olson? Are you looking for "The Big Scoop?" If so, my friend, the Varsity is the place for you.

You too can write a news story, anybody can. First we start you off slowly, give you the situation, and tell you where you can collect the facts and opinions to make your story another jewel shining on the page of the newspaper that all your friends read. Then we get you into the heavier stuff, where you have to use your head, and then buddy you're hooked. There's no way out for a confirmed Varsity hack.

This paper runs through volunteer services (even if we have to break a few legs). Many things happen on the campus (so much you'll probably wonder why you spend all that time in bed), and they all have to be reported. Writers and photographers have a chance to work in news, in sports or in the culture biz. Feature writers are more than welcome. Pick a topic and come and talk to us. We're easy.

Come in any time and introduce yourself at The Varsity office and be the first in your class to become a Varsity hack. We're at 91 St. George St., on the second floor. If you don't see anybody immediately, look down, we usually have our ears to the ground listening for "The Big Scoop."

"Are you reading that sensationalist, underground rag again?"

Happy family in Governing Council

The university community likes to think of itself as quite different from the surrounding city, a small quiet burg uninvolved in the politics, traffic and business of Toronto. This attitude was more noticeable in the past, but the years of expansion for the university has made the university even more dependent on the city and outside business to meet its needs. The university is big business and it takes businessmen to run it.

An illustration of how business and university government can become intertwined is carried on page one today, an interesting story on Mr. W.J.D. Lewis, Mr. Lewis is executive vice-president of Prudential Insurance Co. of America, member of the U of T Governing Council, and since 1972 a member of the board of directors of Crown Trust, which manages about 90 houses on university land.

This is not damning in any way. Businessmen tend to have fingers in many related puddings, but the past history of Crown Trust management around the campus has not been good in the eyes of many student-tenants. Crown Trust does not directly manage the houses, but turns them over to middlemen who are more interested in speculation than supplying decent housing. Rents are high and the tenants are subject to abrupt notices to vacate, as shown in a situation on Sussex St., reported last week in The Varsity.

It might be correct to call Mr. Lewis' position into question for its possibilities of conflict of interest. Or it could be forgotten as just another case of comfortable "keep-it-in-the-family" business dealings. But down at the bottom of it are the students who pay high rents to middlemen who won't guarantee that the student won't be looking for new accommodations in mid-year.

Another case in point is that of C. Mallin Harding, chairman of the Governing Council and of Harding Carpets Ltd., which reported a nine-month profit this year of $2.5 million. Mr. Harding has been associated with the university longer than with the business world; he received his B.A. here in 1931. His other business positions include: director of Toronto-Dominion Bank, Canada Permanent Mortgage Corp., and Union Gas Co. of Canada. And doubtless he commands great respect in the business world.

Was it favoritism or the best tender that resulted in Harding Carpets laying some of the carpet in the new Roberts Library? (Lord knows there's a lot of carpet in that place!) The Varsity has yet to establish proceedings surrounding the tendering of the carpet contract, but you can assume it was all perfectly businesslike and quite legal. All one big happy family on the Governing Council.

The university, due to its increasing need for space has had to pay quite a bit of attention to land dealings in the past few years, and has incurred the wrath of the Sussex area residents for the swift breakup of neighbourhoods, and also from Kensington residents, who can see it coming.

The university, when it moves in, moves like a developer, but is not held accountable for its actions. In a way, it has usurped the city's traditional right to plan the growth and redevelopment of Toronto, substituting its own planning that is tenuous and subject to the whims of government cutbacks.

There are areas on the campus that were cleared of houses two or three years ago where planned university buildings have yet to begin construction. It was the quick notification by the university of their need for a piece of land that resulted in the situation on Sussex St. last week.

When residents in the Sussex area complained loudly about a development Greenwin was planning in their area, a few years ago, U of T took the problem off their hands by a simple trade. The university took the Sussex land for a beautiful five-story parking lot and let Greenwin loose to raise havoc in Ramsden Park on what had formerly been university land. The university got what it wanted (land closer to home) and Ramsden Park got Greenwin. Lucky them.

City politicians are getting quicker at taking on large developers for unprincipled building, but the university, with top business connections and an aura of public service about it, has yet to be challenged for their breakup of mid-town neighborhoods. It represents one of the larger vested interests in the city, beating the Eaton family hands down for its ability to move, unencumbered by city politicians.

The Eatons have their problems with Eaton Centre, and last week The Varsity reported the university's desire to help the Eatons on their way by divesting themselves of an unimportant property in the downtown area. They moved around the will of a lady that disliked the Eatons, and it appears that the land will soon belong to the developers of the centre.

This community is not separate from that which surrounds it. The university grows (at the expense of householders in the area). It is a business, probably more complicated than most, and what appears at the top are businessmen and what stays at the bottom are students and tenants, excluded from even a child's right in the family.

Trot criticizes Communist Party

There has been much coverage in your Friday paper on Chile, including an editorial and a comprehensive feature on the nature of the struggle in Chile over the last 12 months. However I feel that in spite of the overwhelming violence brought on the Chilean people by the army, the fascists and the factory owners, the role of the Communist Party within the Allende government must be criticized.

The feature article on Chile, "Successful coup, Chile in trouble" points out the two opposing forces, right and left, that were mobilizing outside the framework of the government intrigue, doubledealing and complete sellouts. The article implies that the workers should seize control of the factories, and farms they must control distribution and they must form "autonomous workers' defence committees". The article goes on to say how growing numbers of militants were learning these lessons through action.

However, references in the article to the government of Allende are couched in terms that can leave the reader with only one conclusion. The government was a block to the workers, and stood idly by while the right-wing forces mobilized toward the eventual coup. One fact that never gets much publicity is that Allende was killed by his own army which had surrounded the palace.

In 1971 Allende said "I have absolute confidence in the workers of the armed forces. This confidence led the leader of the Chilean Communist Party to the absurd statement that arming the people is "equivalent to showing distrust in army."

Even John Bizzell reassured those who were concerned about the role of the army stating that "the army has agreed to respect the Constitution and the electoral decision of the people in electing the Popular Unity... the army has remained loyal and increasingly so." Bizzell is the Canadian Chairman of the Young Communist League.

We see that the Allende popular front government, despite phrasology to the contrary, as being placed squarely between the bosses and workers, facing the prospect of helping the bourgeoisie or being violently overthrown by them.

The Popular Front or Unidad Popular is a coalition of various parties which adapt to their lowest common denominator, the program of the pro-capitalist forces. The UP could not possibly break out of the bourgeois system not even by "legal" or "peaceful" means. The program of this group speaks for itself, but so does the role of its main proponent, the Communist Party of Chile, urged on by the Moscow bureaucrats and supported around the world by Communist Parties such as the one in Canada.

In order to protect the gains of the workers, described so well in the Varsity Article, and in order to lead them forward to the seizure of power, a Leninist vanguard is necessary. The workers have shown that they are willing to thrust themselves forward to win control of their own lives, of their economy and country. But they need a principled program and single party that is dedicated to the smashing of the bourgeois apparatus, with no ifs, ands or buts. The Allende experience stands in stark contrast to this.

We here in Canada have the duty to support and defend the gains of the workers, students, women and peasants in Chile. We must build mass opposition to political repression and physical terrorism in Chile under the aegis of the military Junta. We must stop the Canadian government from providing diplomatic cover to the new military dictatorship through formal recognition of the new government. We must protest, with renewed vigour, the villainous role of the CIA and the US government in their drive to undermine and smash popular revolts all around the world.

Communist Party opposes junta

We view the violent and illegal seizure of power by the military junta in Chile in which President

Salvador Allende and thousands of others lost their lives, as a most tragic breach of democracy in our hemisphere. The government of President Allende was attempting to affect social change through constitutional processes and the military coup d'etat must be seen and opposed for the anti-democratic, anti-social, and indeed murderous, travesty it is.

In Canada we must exert pressure on our government to withhold diplomatic recognition from the junta, to raise and support measures of censure in the United Nations, and to withhold any kind of support for the junta.

We feel that University of Toronto students and faculty have an obligation to help in these endeavors and in the attempt to discover the facts of the present situation in Chile by working with the Canadian Committee for Solidarity with Democratic Chile; circulating petitions; making representations to all levels of government; writing letters and sending telegrams; pursuing and publicizing research; calling meetings and demonstrations of solidarity and any other steps that might help.

Accordingly we and other concerned members of the University of Toronto call on you to join in furthering the work.

Mather questions firing policy

The report of the Task Force on Academic Appointments says "reasons for a proposed negative (tenure) recommendation should be given to the candidate..." (III (3) (b) 6). The Canadian Association of University Teachers strongly supports this view, and it is the practice at York and other universities. I have yet to be given a satisfactory explanation of why I have been denied tenure.

In IV they recommend that a request for a review must be lodged with the President within 30 days. In my case I was not given the information I wanted and needed from the Chairman of the Math Department for 11 months, and the immediately requested a review.

"They say (at the bottom of the second column as printed in the Bulletin) "...tenure seems to us to be the best method so far devised to recognize and protect the autonomy and integrity of the scholar's pursuit of knowledge..." I look at some of the people in my department who are partially responsible for my refusal of tenure, and see men who have done no research for years and who are evaluated by their students to be poor teachers. For their tenure means, solely, unjustified job security. In V the report says "...no dismissal proceedings have been instituted under the 'Haist' rules since their adoption in 1967".

Bookstore replies

This year's Student Handbook appears to be somewhat misleading in regard to the U of T Bookstores. Roughly 95 per cent of the books at both the Bookroom and the Textbook Store are supplied by Canadian publishers and agents. In every case they are sold at Canadian list price. All paperbacks obtained directly from the States are sold at American list price. Hardcover texts imported directly carry a surcharge of 5 per cent to help defray the costs of importing (last year the amount paid to one broker was over $3,000; we also have to employ a customs clerk).

The Textbook Store gives a 5 per cent discount on all hardcover textbooks. The fact that a book has a 'K' stamped inside indicates that it comes from the Humanities Section and has no bearing whatever on discount.

The SCM does not give discounts on hardcover textbooks which carry a publisher's discount of 20 per cent.

Lastly, to suggest that "other students sometimes leave books lying around for you to find", seems an irresponsible remark to include in such a publication.

Toike condemned

Reactions by people reading the Toike Oike progress from an indignant outrage to a mild amusement and benign condescension. After all, the paper is written by some incurable morons in the engineering Faculty. People learn to bear kitsch and bad taste imposed on them, and engineers are well known for their apathy.

The Toike Oike had been the subject of various articles and probes last year on campus, ranging in tone from sermon-like to sociological. The Varsity finally avoided antagonism and pleaded with the Tooke for a new and "intelligent" kind of journalism as an alternative to the politics-ridden Varsity. All this publicity only delighted Toike "editors" who responded with even grosser jokes and pictures, to the extent that a committee of engineering undergraduates was drawn up to look into the quality of the paper.

It appears all these efforts have been in vain, for the Toike reappeared last week with all its usual infantile babblings and the world's worst jokes; only they are more moronic than ever. It has come to the point where it does not invite contempt anymore but irritation. The inevitable question is, who is the Toike for?

The Toike definitely does not represent engineering students as a whole, as far as their social behaviour is concerned. Most people in engineering dismiss it as stupid but harmless (and "fun"). It is no longer harmless, however, as many people outside engineering have a chance to look at it, thanks to the efficient and careful distribution of the paper by the Toike staff at all strategic points around campus. The Toike has noisily set out to distort the image of the engineer. It has equated virility to the worst type of locker-room conversations. It has assumed that the engineer is so obsessed with inferiority complexes that he needs constant reinforcement, that if for an instant he is not convinced that he is superior to an "artsie" he will drop dead. It believes and sets out to prove that engineering freshmen need brutal and sadistic initiations. It thinks the engineer is so sexually depraved that he needs a Playboy-type dirty joke every other half hour to relieve the boredom of lectures, no matter how much more "relevant" they are than "artsie" courses. It makes engineers enemies of various groups and causes and, worse, makes engineers as laughing stock of the whole university community. In the process, it has created a stereotype of the engineer as ignorant, vociferous, sex starved and beer soaked. It is reasonable to assume that many people would hardly attempt to start a conversation with an engineer at all.

So who does the paper represent? Traditionally it had been a manifest aspect of a fraternity born out of hard work. But it has grown into mere tools for some people who are castrated intellectually and emotionally, perhaps stunted in their development at an early age who use the paper as a projection of their lapsed minds and caricature of their fantasies.

Many engineers have expressed their feelings that the Toike has insulted their intelligence. The joke has been carried too far. It is time for the committee formed last year to do its work and have some sort of quality control. This should not be confused with censorship but only a way to curb excesses by some individuals who supposedly write news for the Engineering Faculty staff but think they are on Penthouse's staff.

This letter would not have been written had the Toike not abused funds provided by the Engineering Society trying to circulate all over campus, distorting the image of most engineers and promoting a strange kind of chauvinism and exhibitionism.

The academic woman

"You've come a long way, baby!" (Really?)

By NORMA BOWEN

Bernard Shaw once remarked, "When I speak of the Case of Equality I mean human equality; and that, of course, can only mean one thing: it means equality of income." Although I tend to agree with the sense of Shaw's remarks that one can only measure "equality" in terms of a universally agreeable monetary factor, the problem goes much deeper than this Equal pay is not enough.

Efforts are being made at some universities to reduce the discrepancies that exist between male and female salaries. However, equal pay will not solve all the problems, because the subtleties of the discriminatory attitudes that exist at universities are far too deep.

In the first place women are expected to enter a masculine-oriented world, an essentially male preserve, where the behaviors too often benignly negate any contribution that women can make to learning.

Secondly, until we examine dispassionately certain assumptions about women and remove the present barriers which prevent the maximum utilization of the abilities of qualified women, we will achieve very little.

False assumptions about the academic woman

If administrators were questioned regarding the paucity of women in academic posts, most would reply that they are very anxious to appoint women to these posts, but that relatively few women apply, and these that do are not as good as men. This explanation reinforces the most fallacious and widespread assumption that men are intellectually superior to women.

However, to accept this assumption as fact and to act upon it as such, is to deny the ability of women in a most contemptuous way. If the fact is that women of capability and experience do not exist in sufficient numbers, then as academics, who strive for truth and objectivity, we should look for factors which consistently militate against producing women who are suitable for responsible positions in universities. (Ironically, the universities are still predominantly male in their staffing, though female in their undergraduate student body.)

There is little doubt that the ability to learn to reason, and to create are shared by both sexes. We cannot differentiate by sex. In so doing, sex-typing gets in the way of best person for the job.

The difficult and absurd assumption that men resemble one another, and that women are necessarily different from all men, that neither sex has a monopoly of flabbiness in both sexes.

A second assumption is that women do not take their careers as seriously as men, it is argued, do not view professional accomplishment or achievement as part of human existence, but rather they should have the right to devote themselves to "if they feel like it", a freedom which men who have to continue working (or are retired).

To support this argument we are told that women are less productive than men. Recent findings (Guyer and Fidel, American Psychologist, 1973), however, indicate that the productivity of women, in general, is not unduly different from men.

At the assistant and lecturer ranks there is no significant difference between the rate of publication of men and women. At the two highest academic levels women do publish less—approximately the average of one paper per year.

One needs to look at institutional, as well as non-institutional, factors that tend to deter publishing by serious and highly motivated female members of faculty (as they must be at those academic levels).

Stumbling blocks to change

From the initial data that I have been able to collect, it seems that women apply for and receive smaller amounts in research grants, or, if not, they tend to have fewer personnel on their research team, and smaller laboratory set-ups.

One possible explanation for these differences is perhaps the area in which the research is being done. Women tend to be predominant in the arts and social sciences where the research is small staff compared to the sciences where one usually needs large contract research.

An alternative explanation is that by social conditioning women have learned to be conservative in their handling of funds (which usually tend to be small sums) and this budgetary restraint is carried over in their work habits.

The problems of academic women are often put in economic terms, and in terms of the question of supply and demand. Women, we are told, regard work as temporary, and therefore are more suited for part-time positions rather than for long-term commitments. Women are thus regarded as "birds of passage" and men as "salt of the earth".

Indeed, some women may accept the temporary convenience of a part-time job, or payment by course, because it is the only way in which the conditions of employment would facilitate their multiple role of professional, mother, and wife. Although academic women who decide to have children may interrupt their careers, there is no excuse for denying them the opportunity to follow the profession of their choice to the full extent of their ability.

Further, the assumption that a woman who spends a few months of her life bearing a child is incapacitated for the rest of her life from following the same profession as a man follows, should be abolished. Some critics may argue, however, that the university is neither a charitable organization nor an association that should be responsible for the amelioration of society's ills.

Nevertheless, the point is that many men who are disabled or have their work interrupted do not encounter the same difficulties as women do in re-entering the profession. The fact is that men are paid unequal salaries for the same function.

Again, what do we mean by equal qualifications? Canada it means the highest degree of achievement. The fact is that men are paid unequal salaries for the same function.

The difficulty with the suggestion that equal qualifications, male or female, should be the basis for equal pay is that it suggests that all individuals have the same level of expertise to the point, which results in the same pay.

In addition, when we consider the highest level of competence, it is not the level of competence that counts both the qualifications and the experiences that individuals had. Time, in and of itself, is not a measure of competence.

One important factor, however, is that a person may encounter interruptions, and these interruptions may affect faculty members differently. Some are open to the possibility of "equal pay for equal work".

What women realize is that the best performance is often achieved by male or female superior to and performing superior performance.

University's failure to provide equal pay for equal work is a major obstacle to the advancement of women in the profession.

It seems that the "equal pay for equal work" principle is not being applied in the same way to men and women.

What is disturbing is the fact that the traditional male role is being challenged by women, and this challenge is not being met with the same enthusiasm as it once was.

It is time for us to re-examine our educational policies and to see if they are truly for the benefit of all. It is obvious that the current policies do not come about from a pressure brought to bear on the system.

In the United States, there have been changes in university policies on women's work, such as the implementation of the Canadian university system.

Some might argue that universities cannot provide a satisfactory environment for women, but rather they are not being asked to do so. The fact is that universities are not being asked to do so, and to do so would be a waste of resources.

Norma Bowen is a professor at the University of Guelph.

Why is this man so smug? Probably because he realizes that, economically, the roles are reversed re-entering the profession. The fact is that men are paid unequal salaries for the same function.

Salary studies reveal inequality

More than a decade ago, J.H. Stewart Reid, the then executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), sent a letter to the presidents of the 35 universities and colleges, whose faculty associations were affiliated with CAUT. The letter read in part: "there should be no discrimination based upon sex among faculty members, with regard to pay, status, or work load. Women who are appointed to the teaching staff of a Canadian university are expected to have the same opportunities as similarly qualified men."

The presidents were asked to comment on the above resolution, and to provide CAUT with a statement of their university's official policy on the matter. Only 23 institutions endorsed the policy of ensuring equal opportunity to women faculty members.

CAUT - Robson study

Five years later, in 1966, R.A.H. Robson, a University of British Columbia sociology professor, prepared a comparison of men's and women's salaries in the academic profession for CAUT and extended this study further in 1967 on behalf of the Commission on the Status of Women in Canada.

The findings were not only startling, they were downright disturbing. At every level of competence (as measured by highest degree earned and experience) the typical woman had a lower rank than her male counterpart. Similarly, only women with PhDs stood as much chance as men to be appointed to the rank of full professor or dean, and then only when they were 50 or older.

On the other hand, men without PhDs (and some with only one professional degree) were found at all levels of academic and administrative appointments. Again, rate of promotion was found to be much slower for females than it was for males even when they both had the same level of competence.

The coup de grace, however, was that the extent of salary discrimination between men and women could vary as much as $7,049. The sex difference in median salaries over the years from 1956-65 in median salaries over the years from $1,232 to $7 and from 1963-64 increased from $1,232 to $1,779, and the average difference between male and female salary for the 1965-66 was $2,262

The above statistics, potentially very explosive, seemed not to have impressed the academic world one bit.

AUCC - Adam study, 1971

Everybody needed more data and like true academicians who become seduced with the research syndrome, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) in 1971 commissioned June Adam, a University of Calgary psychology professor, to prepare a profile of women in Canadian universities.

Her very comprehensive analysis looks at the frequency distributions of females and males at various levels of university life. Furthermore, her data support Robson's findings.

Adam finds that female students are over-represented at the undergraduate level, particularly in the arts and education, and are under-represented at the graduate level, particularly in the pure sciences. The findings of Robson and Adam raised a lot of expectations of redress in academic women, and created many visions of the possibilities for changes in the system. It was hoped that the findings alerted a large number of people to the existing inadequacies and inequities within the university profession.

Besides, feelings of discrimination against women that were resented for a long time were now being properly examined and challenged. Indeed, at its annual meeting in 1971, the AUCC board of directors established a standing committee on the status of women in universities. It was also to report on the progress being made at each institution.

However, the terms, of reference of this committee, like those of most status of women committees at individual universities, ensured that the consequences would have no significant effect.

Recent studies - Statistics Canada

The data from Statistics Canada for the last four years seem to indicate that the problem may have worsened. For example, when median salary annual salaries of women and men are compared for the same field, men's annual salaries exceed those of women in each category in 1969-70.

The percentages by which men's median salaries exceed those of women range from a high of 31.5 per cent for ungraded professors (in those institutions where there are no thanks) in the humanities to a low of 1.8 per cent for assistant professors in the humanities.

Male professors in the biological sciences have median salaries that are 16.6 per cent higher than those of female professors. The highest percentage difference by which men's salaries exceed those of women is 48.7 per cent in the ungraded professor rank.

Again, for the year 1970-71, the median of the annual salaries of women and men by years since obtaining their highest degree show large discrepancies at each level. The percentage difference by which men's median salaries exceed those of women range from a high of 74.1 per cent ($21,767 and $12,500) (respectively) for faculty with a first professional degree beyond the first baccalaureate received 20 to 24 years ago, to a low of 1.0 per cent for those who earned their degree 10 to 14 years ago.

For all categories of years since the award of the highest degree, the greatest percentage difference between women's and men's median salaries occurred for those who held a professional degree beyond the first baccalaureate. At this level, men's median earnings exceeded those of women by 61.0 per cent ($17,817 and $11,070 respectively). Similar discrepancies occurred at the first baccalaureate (34.5 per cent), the masters (10.5 per cent), and the doctorate (13.5 per cent) levels.

Although complete data for the years 1971-72 and 1972-73 are not yet available, the preliminary data released by Statistics Canada for 1972-73 show that there are large differences in the average and median salaries for men and women faculty.

Almost all of those universities reporting (with the exception of two) showed differences between men's and women's salaries. The highest reported difference in the average salary was $5,304, and in the median salary it was $4,900. At the tenth percentile the highest reported difference was $4,932, and at the ninetieth percentile the highest reported difference was $9,953.

Women seem not to have come a long way since Robson's study report, in spite of assurances from most university administrators that men's and women's salaries are being equalized.

City jams caused by U of T

By JULIA ELCOCK

The University of Toronto along with the Government of Ontario and other agencies, are major causes of the present central Toronto traffic difficulties according to a recent study by the City's Public Works Department.

The study suggests reforms in parking policy as a solution to Toronto's tie-ups. The major recommendations were to charge a flat hourly rate instead of daily rates and to limit both private and public parking facilities in order to discourage all day parkers. Since these cars are used only during rush hours, they are a major cause of "congestion and deteriorating environment".

Traffic travelling to midtown, an area embracing both the Ontario government and the university, was found to cause more problems during peak hours than traffic going downtown. This in turn was blamed on the number of parking spaces supplied by these and other institutions which were not under municipal legislation. This legislation calls for one parking space for approximately every four and a half employees.

U of T has 3000 parking places or one space for every 3.6 employees. This figure does not include student or on-the-street parking.

The daily cost of a parking space at the university ranges from 30 to 60 cents a day as compared to a $2.50 daily rate downtown.

The study found that 96.7 per cent of university parking were all-day parkers. It estimated that provided the university cut all day parking by 90 per cent there would be 940 fewer cars in rush hour, the equivalent to the hourly traffic on one and a half arterial lanes.

Surveys showed that 40 per cent of all day parkers in midtown Toronto were in areas accessible by 30 minutes travel on the TTC.

Public transportation is seen as "a key element for the (restricted parking) proposals to succeed" and suggestions were made to improve transit while making car travel inconvenient. The study mentioned an increasing public acceptance of public transit.

Doug Brown, of the Annex Ratepayers' Association, whose area is directly affected by university parking, commented favourably on the report. Brown said that his organization is "looking for a policy for the whole area to reduce traffic". They would like to insure that "cars entering off arterial roads are not using the area as another place to park or an alternative way downtown".

Dick Gilbert of Sussex-Ulster area, adjacent to U of T, said that the study was "very good" particularly the comments about the university's "irresponsible" parking. He said the report was a "very welcome change by the public works committee".

Resident associations in both areas have been studying ways of reducing and controlling traffic on their streets, such as parking permits and "bumps" in the road to force traffic to reduce speed. A traffic maze was due to be built in the Sussex area in August but the construction is being held up until provincial approval is obtained.

Kiel Gregory, administrative assistant to the U of T business affairs vice president, said that he hadn't any comment on the study and that it was a "matter of the university to decide".

The study was sent to several organizations in Toronto including the University and they were requested to respond by the end of September 1973.

SAC pops question

By ELAINE KAHN

Sometime in the next few weeks, 10 per cent of the students on campus—both men and women—will receive a questionnaire "just checking out the attitudes of women towards certain things."

This is one of the projects being undertaken by the Students' Administrative Council's Committee on Women, Committee organizer Heather Ridout said yesterday.

Ridout said the committee, which was set up in May, is trying to accomplish more than its original purpose of looking into the status of women on campus.

"I don't think we want it to be a women's lib group on campus," Ridout said. She'd prefer it to be "an umbrella thing" centralizing and "legitimizing" women's campus activities.

There are 40 to 50 people on the committee's mailing list, but the actual core are the dozen who attend the meetings regularly, Ridout said.

The next meeting is Tuesday, September 25 at 7 p.m. in the SAC office.

Ridout said she, "was surprised that a lot of women are personally liberating themselves" rather than feeling like part of a group which has a commitment to change basic social structures to liberate all women.

Ceta Ramkhalwansingh, who is coordinating many university women's activities including women's studies programs, said the SAC committee is only "one small detail" among the number of women's activities on campus.

"It's not a major kind of activity," she said, apparently dissatisfied with its formalized nature.

She said, "there's a mushrooming power of everyone getting into the act" with women's activities, but didn't appear to think that questionnaires and conferences were the best way of accomplishing things.

The Ontario Federation of Students and the SAC committee will host a conference on women from October 26 to 28, Ridout said.

She said she hoped there would be more student participation in it than there was at a similar conference here last January.

Report delayed

By ELAINE KAHN

The committee appointed last year by Provost Don Forster to "rectify anomalies regarding salaries of fulltime women faculty" has not yet handed down its report, University of Toronto vice-president for internal affairs, Jill Conway said yesterday.

The delay occurred because Erindale and Scarborough Colleges, who were not originally planned for study, Conway said, asked the committee to examine their situations.

Conway said Peter Meincke, committee chairman, has almost finished the report.

Conway is also a member of the task force appointed by the business affairs committee to examine the status of full-time non-academic women on the university payroll.

Conway said letters were sent to all these women, and the general feeling from replies indicated "a sense of frustration in the areas of promotion and job mobility."

Conway said that she and Gwen Russell, of the governing council, are preparing recommendations now.

Conway said that although "I think personnel would hire a male secretary-stenographer if one turned up," in the non-academic staff, "you very rarely find males and females clustered in the same job area."

There will be a meeting of the Arts and Science Students' Union on Monday Sept. 17 at 4:00 p.m. in the Arts and Science office, Rm. 2097 Sid Smith. Workers at Artistic want bargaining rights

This article is reprinted from the Toronto Citizen.

By ERIC MILLS

Out in Toronto's industrial 'ghetto' of small manufacturing concerns, a small group of mostly immigrant workers are fighting for the most basic working class right—the to bargain collectively as a trade union.

In a struggle reminiscent of the early days of organized labour, 120 employees of the Artistic Woodwork Company are on strike, not over wages, but in an attempt to win security from arbitrary management power.

The union, the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union, won little more in three months of negotiations that a 65 cent hourly increase for the workers, who make wooden frames and mouldings for frames. The company refuses to budge on the critical issues of seniority in hiring, firing and promotion managements rights, and union security.

Like many other plants in north-western Toronto, Artistic Woodwork employs a large number of immigrants, including Italians, Greeks, Portuguese and Latin Americans, who have language and other difficulties in an organizing against exploitation.

CTCU secretary treasurer Madeleine Parent says that the essential point in the strike is that immigrant workers are fighting for their rights against employers who want to use them as cheap labour.

"There are hundreds of thousands of unorganized workers in Toronto sweatshops," she says. "They need to be free from fear of discharge and other arbitrary actions; they need a decent union. If we succeed in this case, it will encourage other immigrant workers to organize collectively to fight for their democratic rights."

Fighting for 20 years

The CTCU, a small union affiliated with the Confederation of Canadian Unions, has been fighting for 20 years in small plants in Ontario. Since it won the Texpack strike in Brantford two years ago, the union has, with the help of volunteers, expanded its organizing drives, most recently succeeding at Puratex Knitting Mills in Toronto.

The struggle is an important example of the need for unionization of the unorganized two-thirds of Canada's working people, many of whom work long hours with low pay and with working conditions and even their jobs completely out of their control. Before the CTCU organized Artistic Woodwork earlier this year, the employees worked a 42½ hour week, plus an average of four hours overtime, at wages from $2.00 to $2.95 an hour. According to assembler Ricardo Pena, who works at the company's main plant on Densley Avenue, between Eglinton and Lawrence off Keele, the company occasionally demands five hours on Saturdays. Not surprisingly compulsory overtime is also a bargaining item.

Strike organizer Danny Drache says the company attempted to use the 65 cent wage boost over two years — instead of its original offer of 35 cents over three years — as a bribe to induce the union to accept other clauses which he describes as totally arbitrary and in some cases "vicious and punitive". "They want to have a hand on the whip," he said.

The most important issue in the strike, as it is in many conflicts between newly established unions and management is seniority—the right of workers who have worked the longest with the company to be the last fired, first rehired and first promoted. The union's position is that the seniority principle prevents discrimination against workers on the basis of age and race, while the company insists that its rights to run the operation must be unimpeded.

Artistic's chief negotiator, assistant manager S.J. Van Zyl said that the company is willing to accept seniority on a plantwide basis for promotions and recall from lay-offs. However, he quickly qualified this acceptance, adding that while seniority would be first priority, "some determination of skills and performance" would also be considered by the company's decision makers.

Low Priority

In fact, Van Zyl indicated seniority would be low on the list of priorities, stating, "Wherever there are equal qualifications, seniority would prevail." The union's opinion, as expressed in a leaflet, of the company stance is that "when in the company's judgement, there is any difference in quality between two workers, all seniority rights of a senior workers would be negated."

A pervasive management rights clause which Drache says was used as an ultimatum in close to three months of bargaining—the company would not sign a contract—appears to leave everything but the application of the rules to the company.

Although Van Zyl says the company's lawyers, Matthews, Dinsdale and Clarke, advised that rules may be challenged through the grievance procedure, the clause states "that it is the exclusive function of the company to...make, enforce, alter, from time to time, rules to be observed by the employees." A disciplined or discharged employee may only grieve if he claims "that he has been discharged or disciplined without cause", according to management's proposal.

The CTCU charges the company can discharge any worker for violation of a plant rule, no matter how frivolous. Even if a rule could be grieved, which would depend on an improbable legal interpretation of the clause, this could only be done after a worker had been punished for violating it. Drache considers all management's rights clauses to be "odious", but he says the union will accept one providing it is neither "punitive nor restrictive".

Artistic woodwork is attacking the union on two fronts—at the bargaining table and on the picket line, by continuing to run the plant. Van Zyl said that production was moving so well that the company does not want to hire any more workers at the present time. He claimed that over 60 per cent of the firm's normal complement of 117 employees is working, plus none foremen and some managerial staff, with an output that is 70 per cent of normal. "We're improving everyday," he says; there's no difficulty maintaining production. Asked if the company still intends to sign a contract, he replied that circumstances had changed since the beginning of the strike, and "we're giving a fair amount of thought to the total situation."

Almost nil

Production of finished products is running at almost nil, the CTCU counters, because all the finishers, necessary for both moulding and finishing frames, have gone out. About one-third of the workers, the same third who opposed the union's certification, are scabbing on their fellow workers. CTCU secretary-treasurer Parent, who along with a worker was knocked down by a company car August 22, says that production is necessarily so restricted that the only reason for operating the company is psychological, to attempt to discourage striking workers.

At the bargaining table, Artistic Woodwork has refused to accept the checkoff, or automatic deduction of union dues from pay cheques, which is accepted by nearly every organized company. In a "democratic country...workers should have the right not to belong to a union," Van Zyl insisted, even if all workers benefit from collective bargaining. In fact, the union is not demanding that all workers be forced to join it, only that they pay dues because they benefit, a long-accepted compromise with anti-union companies.

Meanwhile, every weekday 50 to 75 pickets take on the company and police.

Support has come from many quarters, and Parent is expecting more. In addition to Alderpersons John Sewell and Dorothy Thomas and supporters unidentified with organizations, members of the Italian-Canadian Association and the Waffle, including James Laxer, have marched on the picket line. Panhellenic Liberation Movement leader Andreas Papanicolas, son of a former Greek premier, denounced Artistic Woodwork in a speech to picketers September 4.

"I feel deep disappointment...that in this particular establishment workers are earning wages that are a shame," Papanicolas said.

"But far more important is that you are being denied the right to organize."

Although strike pay is $25 per week or less, the CTCU is prepared for a long strike. It is asking for support on the picket line at 23 and 25 Densley Avenue, near Keele and Lawrence, particularly between 6:45 and 7:45 a.m., when scabs are herded in. For more information call the CTCU's Toronto office at 537-6765.

Bargaining slow

The union has more recently charged the company with bargaining in bad faith. The charge will be heard by the Ontario Labour Relations Board a week today. The workers charge that after the company agreed on wages they refused to negotiate on anything else and insisted on repressive management rights, firing and seniority clauses.

Meanwhile management is avoiding the high cost of professional strike-breakers by hiring more immigrant workers as scabs on the promise of help with the immigration department, according to strike-supporter Bob Davis.

There will be a conference on the Role of immigrant workers in Toronto and The Artistic Woodwork strike in particular on Tuesday at 7:30 at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, 252 Bloor Street West.

Chaired by Hesp, the meeting will have other speakers including Thomas, Sewell, Waffle leader Mel Watkins and a number of labour leaders.

Workers arrested

Metro Toronto police are helping Artistic Woodwork by escorting non-union workers across picket lines. Police have arrested at least 24 unionists and strike supporters at the plant on charges of trespassing, public mischief, intimidation, obstruction and assaulting police.

City aldermen John Sewell, Dorothy Thomas and Dan Heap addressed the City Executive on September 5 and a motion was subsequently approved by council last Wednesday calling on the police to take a neutral role on the picket line.

The motion also called for both picketers and strikebreakers to refrain from violence or other acts of provocation. It also called for picketers to be allowed a "reasonable opportunity" to leaflet and talk to people in the vicinity of the strike.

The executive also called for a meeting between strikers and the police.

Despite the council's motion police are continuing to "move scabs in as fast as they can" according to Bob Davis, a strike supporter. He said that things were a little quieter at the smaller St. Regis plant but there were still 20-25 police at the larger plant to oppose the 40 strikers.

The police and the police commission have refused to meet the strikers or report to city council.

Kraft, Dare and non-union grapes to go

SAC to revive boycott of foods on campus

The Students' Administrative Council will undertake a campaign this fall to have foods which are being boycotted for political or labour reasons removed from cafeterias and eating places on the U of T campus.

High on the boycott list are Kraft food products, Dare cookies, and California grapes and lettuce.

According to SAC Services Commissioner Seymour Kanowitch, the first step in the campaign is to do some research, and find out which of these taboo products are being used in cafeterias. SAC will be assisted in gathering this information by United Farmworker organizers who are on campus drumming up support for the renewed grape and lettuce boycott.

Next step in the plan will be to approach the caterers or student councils who are using the boycotted goods, and persuade them to use alternative products.

If this does not succeed, Kanowitch says, SAC will organize a series of rotating boycotts of those eating places which do not comply and remove the goods from the menus.

The boycott of Kraft's great array of products—salad dressings, peanut butter, instant dinners, as well as bland cheese—began in October, 1971. The National Farmers' Union (NFU) instituted the boycott against Kraft, a large monopolistic food corporation, to dramatize the plight of the small farmer who is being driven out of the farming business through government policy and big-business farming. The NFU also wants food processors to negotiate product prices directly through a producers' representative, presumably the NFU.

Prices are now set by marketing boards, which are ultimately controlled by the provincial government. The NFU insists the government is ultimately more concerned with serving the interests of big business than of protecting the farmer.

The NFU, founded in 1969, is still relatively small. In Canada, it has signed up only 10 per cent of Canadian farmers, although it has considerable strength among Prince Edward Island potato growers.

The Kraft boycott is an attempt to form an alliance between the farmer and the consumer, who is equally victimized by monopolistic controls in the food industry.

The Dare boycott is in support of the (18-month) strike against Dare Foods Ltd. in Kitchener. The strike began over a wage increase that was too low, and was discriminatory towards women employees in the plant.

The strikers also demanded better working conditions.

The cookie factory has continued to operate, with scab labourers and returned strikers and now the question is whether the union, Local 173 of the International Brewery and Cereal Workers, will be driven out of the plant.

The boycott of California grapes and lettuce is being revived, because of efforts to break the United Farmworkers Union. The union managed, after years of violence and struggle, to organize migrant armworkers, and secure three-year contracts for them with grape and lettuce growers.

Since the UFW contracts have run out, growers are signing contracts with the Teamsters Union which would bring back the labour-contractor system of hiring farm labour through a middleman, who takes a healthy cut of the worker's earning.

The UFW went on strike in July, and since then union members have been murdered, injured, beaten and arrested. (See Varsity Wednesday September 12.)

Referendum next month

To NUS or not to NUS?

A SAC referendum on U of T membership in the National Union of Student (NUS) will be held on October 17, according to a SAC executive decision made last month.

NUS was founded last November in Ottawa as a successor to the now-defunct Canadian Union of Students. CUS died after U of T students, the largest constituency in the organization, voted to pull out in a 1969 referendum. They took their $25,000 with them.

SAC may also include in the referendum a vote on student participation in decisions governing staff promotion and tenure. The report of the Task Force on Academic Appointments, released last week, rejected the student involvement in tenure decisions. This report has been strongly criticized by the SAC president, Bob Anderson.

Another issue is reform of the U of T Athletic Association Directorate for men which does not give majority representation to students. Seven of the twenty members are students. In contrast, the women's directorate at the Benson Building allows fifteen students with seven nonstudents.

There may also be questions on the university's new discipline system and Code of Behaviour. The code was passed by the Governing Council in June. Among other things, it provides for a tribunal system to hear discipline cases.

SAC will be distributing information prior to the referendum. Further discussion of the referendum is expected at the next SAC meeting on September 19.

Where's the road?

Road reconstruction on Queen's Park Crescent, which has been stalling downtown traffic and at the same time making the road a little safer for student crossings, will be completed by the end of October, according to the projects engineer, H. Abrahams. The east side will be completed this month, but work on the west side is just beginning. Next year will have more excitement in store, Abrahams said—fixing the sewers.

Soccer Blues lose in international tourney

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues suffered two defeats, both by 2-0 scores, during their visit to Oneonta, New York, over the weekend. The games were part of an international tournament won by Birmingham University (England) who defeated Hartwick College (USA) in the final.

Friday evening Toronto played the host team, Hartwick College Warriors. The American squad, who had been beaten only once in nine years on their own field, were immediately set on the defensive by the opening flurry of attacking from the Blues; however, two difficult chances to open the scoring were not converted.

As often happens, the momentum of the game was changed completely by a single telling counterattack. From a direct freekick on the halfway line Hartwick fullback Doug Vandenberg hit a long ball into the heart of the Toronto defence. Skidding off the rain-soaked turf, the ball rebounded from Blues defender Geoff Crewe straight to Tim Kevil, who hit a first-time shot over the outstretched arms of Jack Brand, who had advanced from his crease for the free kick.

After conceding a goal early, the Blues needed time to stabilize. The Warriors did not oblige, for three minutes later, they increased their lead.

Following some complex midfield interpassing, the ball was swiftly directed forward to Ed Engarth. The defence had failed to cover him and he raced in to slot a low drive to the right-hand corner of the net.

Blues woes increased two minutes later when Ian Harris was carried from the field with a groin injury. Nonetheless, Blues weathered the next 15 minutes of furious Hartwick assaults as the fullbacks Iain Slimmon and Bob Cazzola on the outside and Herb Dubsky and Crewe in the middle settled down.

By halftime the play was even, with Tim Burns directing long through-balls to exploit the slow-turning Hartwick defence. When play recommenced the Warriors dominated again for ten minutes in their final burst of pressure.

Midfield control by Burns and Bruno Bruni reversed the trend, forcing Hartwick into a defensive posture.

Chances came to each attacker but neither Vince Ierullo nor Peter Hillier was able to capitalize on the brief opportunities presented. Weak finishing prevented even one goal, and the game ended 2-0 for Hartwick.

The following day Blues were matched against MacKenzie College of Sao Paulo, Brazil, who had lost 1-0 to Birmingham. Injuries to Harris and Bruni forced a much-changed formation.

Blues carried the early play, but about six opportunities to open their account were squandered by ineffective finishing. The Brazilians, who played composed soccer in midfield, were jittery at the back and could be caught square due to their crossfield interpassing.

The Toronto attackers were unable to direct the incisive through-ball to take advantage of these weaknesses, nor could they control the pace of the play with their own interpassing to await decisive opportunities.

After 30 minutes a perfect example of the 'springboard' type of goal was fashioned by Mackenzie. Jose Sousa, playing deceptively soccer at midfield, hit a swift low ball to Roberto Moreno, who accelerated past Joe Liscio and slid the ball past the charging Brand.

The goal rocked the Blues and the Brazilians outplayed them territorially for the next 30 minutes. They spent their time chasing the ball instead of playing it.

Eventually a hole opened and another sharp through-ball to Jose Medeiros gave him ample time to score from the right-hand side of the penalty area.

Despite tiredness the Blues began to press forward, but their offensive play lacked the menace shown in the first game. Slowness to shoot prevented the conversion of the opportunities that came.

Blues showed in this tournament that Canadian soccer is reaching a par with that played in countries where it is the national sport. The shortcomings seem to be lack of inventiveness in attack and doubt as to when to change the pace or retain possession in given game situations. English coach John Keighley and Brazilian coach Paulo Mascarenhas were impressed with the standard of play exhibited by the North American teams.

Blues open their season Tuesday, September 18 at 3 pm against perennial title contender McMaster in Varsity Stadium.

Strike against Dare continues, but quietly

Workers at Dare Foods Ltd. have been out on strike for one and one-half years. The strike continues while Dare has been using almost every strike-breaking and union-busting tactic in the labour field.

Dare is carrying on with a skeleton staff made up of scab labourers and returned strikers to keep production going, while at the other end a boycott of Dare products seems to be dying.

The Dare strike began May 29, 1972 when Local 173 of the International Brewery and Cereal Workers voted 97 per cent to reject a 25-cent-an-hour wage increase offered to both men and women. The union wanted a 40 cent increase for each year of the new contract and a reduction in the working day from eight and one-half to eight hours.

The union was looking for better working conditions, including fans to combat the 130-degree temperature in the plant, termination of the occasional production speedups and removal of worker-supervisors. The union also asked for more consideration of women workers with children.

When sympathetic truckers refused to cross the Kitchener picket lines, Dare brought in the Canadian Driver Pool, (CDP), a strike breaking outfit headed by Richard Grange, the man who said he wanted to make $1,000,000 before the age of 28.

Violence broke out on the picket lines, and when Kitchener residents reacted, the CDP were withdrawn from the field and Dare made an offer to the union.

The offer was tightly drawn in opposition to any union organization. There was, in their proposal, to be no check-off of union dues, making it close to impossible for the union to collect the, nor was there to be a union shop.

The union, however, was expected to pay $45,000 damages for Dare property and products. Dare offered no retroactive pay, although there was once a 30-cent per hour retroactive offer. Dare offered 45 cents over two years for women and 55 cents for men. The eight and a half hour day was to continue.

Out of the starting gate the strike has been slow and painful. Violence on the picket line renewed in July of '72 with the appearance of the first scabs, who, after that day, were given an escort of Kitchener police and Dare supervisory personnel. Dare eventually mustered a sufficient work force for one shift, that included 39 members who had broken union ranks to return to work. Manpower referred job-seekers to Dare while strikers visited courts and jail.

A Dare-issued statement read "It is not a legal requirement and we are determined that it will never be necessary that you have to be a member of any union to work for Dare Biscuits." The company launched an ad campaign in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record that led to a $1,500 dollar fine total for three violations of the Ontario Labour Relations Act. Such lines as "the union has not helped either the company or its employees over the past few years and its interference can no longer be tolerated", were the basis of the case.

With the picket line proving to be less and less effective the local pushed for a boycott that the slow-moving union leadership eventually agreed to. All members of the union were told not to buy Dare products. Several chain stores, including A&P, Steinberg's, Dominion, Loblaw's, and I.G.A., supported the boycott. This boycott is still being encouraged by the union.

This past May the two sides agreed on compromise terms to settle the strike, contingent on the union's accepting a limit on the number of strikers that would be rehired. This allowed for the return of fifty workers still on strike, but left 57 others who had been publicly blacklisted by the company high and dry. The local voted 100 per cent to reject this contingency and the settlement stalled.

A 5000 person march was led through the streets of Kitchener on the May 26 to drum up support for the long strike. Pledges were made by several speakers, including David Archer, president of the Canadian Federation of Labour, who promised the support of 700,000 organized workers in Canada.

According to labour law, International Brewery and Cereal Workers could well be decertified as the bargaining representative of the Dare employees. If for a year, there have been no negotiations between the union and company, and no contract is signed, 50 per cent of the company employees can apply to the labour relations board for decertification.

When an application is made, a labour relations board hearing determines if there is any proof that the company is responsible for the breakdown in contract negotiations. If there is not sufficient proof, a vote is held for decertification.

Meanwhile, the strike goes on under the threat of the union being broken. Some of the workers are still on strike, and Dare's present workers are without a union contract. The Dare boycott is still being encouraged, but publicity has declined since the May 26 march in Kitchener.

Football Blues intercept Yeomen

By PAUL CARSON

The football Blues combined a tenacious defense with an opportunistic offence to outscore York Yeomen 42-19 Saturday afternoon before a sparse crowd of about 1,000 at the CNE Stadium.

The victory, Blues' second in two OUAA league games, keeps Varsity in a first-place tie with University of Ottawa Gee-Gees who defeated Queens on Saturday in Kingston.

However, the Varsity-York game was far closer than the somewhat lopsided score indicates as York held a 329-319 yards advantage in total offence and trailed by only 28-19 with less than four minutes remaining. Blues were trapped deep in their own territory, facing a second down and long yardage situation with rookie quarterback Al Brenchley replacing an injured Wayne Dunkley.

Brenchley responded to the pressure with a ten-yard pass to flanker Brent Elsey for a crucial first down, and then combined with halfback Cor Doret for two more completions, the second covering 53 yards to produce the insurance touchdown with 2:11 remaining.

On York's next series, the stand-out Varsity defensive unit made its fourth pass interception and fullback Libert Castillo finished off the scoring in the final seconds with a one-yard touchdown run.

Despite the frequent scoring and high total yardage figures, the game was often dull as Blues seemed unable to muster any enthusiasm for large portions of the game, and only the exceptional play of their defensive unit kept Varsity in the lead. Led by captain Hartley Stern, they picked off four York passes and recovered one fumble, thereby handing the offensive team the ball in excellent field position, particularly in the first half when Varsity made numerous mental errors but escaped with a 21-13 lead at halftime.

Stern's fumble recovery stopped a York drive at the Varsity 12-yard line at the end of the third quarter, while veteran defensive back Doug Ball had two pass interceptions with sophomores Rick Jeysman and Chris Sammut collecting the others.

Sammut's interception in the second quarter, made possible by a hard pass rush from rookie linebacker Harry Mellon, broke a 7-7 tie as he returned the ball 30 yards for a touchdown and Blues never trailed thereafter.

Numerous mistakes, missed blocking and frequent penalties punctuated by spectacular catches by pass receivers on both teams were the story of the first half. Both coaches tried to establish the running game early, but only Blues succeeded. In fact, the Varsity defence held York to 41 net yards rushing for the entire game compared to Blues' total of 117.

Varsity opened the scoring when Dunkley rolled to his left and then threw across the field to end Esteban Andryjowicz for a 31-yard touchdown.

York tied the score less than two minutes later when Aarne Kartna misplayed a punt and the ball bounced right into the arms of a Yeomen lineman who waltzed in untouched from the Varsity 25.

Following Sammut's touchdown, York pulled to within one point when flanker Barry Forbes beat Jeysman to complete a 36-yard touchdown pass at 9:46 of the second quarter. However, Jeysman recovered to break up Yeomen's attempt for a two-point convert.

The Varsity—Mike Cowgill

Listless crowd watches Libert Castillo drive over from the one-yard line to get final Varsity TD.

Blues got some breathing space when Ball made his first interception with one minute remaining in the half and Dunkley hit Doret for a 23-yard touchdown on the very next play.

Blues defense continued their outstanding play as the second half began and the offensive unit responded with its longest sustained drive of the game as Doret scored from one yard out to cap a 69-yard march in nine plays.

Penalties and silly mistakes thwarted both teams until York quarterback Al Langley scored from the Varsity two-yard line at 10:18 of the fourth quarter. Another attempted two-point convert failed and when Doret scored his third touchdown of the day on the next series, the game was effectively over.

Blues came out of the game with three minor injuries as Dunkley should be able to play against Queens with his bruised shoulder, and linemen Bruce Parrack and Ken Hussey should also be fit.

Rookie Bob Hedges led Varsity's developing rushing attack with 59 yards on 12 carries and Castillo ran 12 times for 54 yards. Doret led the pass receivers with five completed 10 of 17 passes for 198 yards.

Blues' kicking specialist Don Thomson also had a good game, converting all six touchdowns and angling most of his punts out of bounds to effectively stop any York runbacks.

As expected, Yeomen were able to penetrate Varsity's pass defense with some consistency, particularly on crossing patterns, as Langley completed 16 of 33 for an eye-catching 288 total yards but Blues did have those four key interceptions.

Ken Hatanaka and Steve Ince each caught five passes for a combined total of 213 yards.

York had a 21-19 edge in total first downs but came out slightly worse on the penalties taking nine for an even 100 yards compared to Blues' total of 92 yards off eleven penalties.

Rugby Blues field three teams

By JAMES MacDONALD

The U of T rugby club will field two and possibly three teams this year in a bid to win the Gilbert Turner trophy. Last year they beat the winners, York, 16-3, but early season losses cost them the title.

Most of last year's team has returned but new players are still being welcomed. Captain John Drummond notes that last year 28 of the club's 33 regulars played at least one game for the first team. In a typical club system, everyone gets a chance to play.

Varsity sports recognizes the growing popularity of this confusing game by including here an explanation of what goes on in the game.

The object is to touch the ball on the ground behind the goal posts, for four points. For a conversion the ball must be placed in front of the spot touched down and kicked through the uprights for two points. Penalty drop and place kicks awarded for various offences are worth three points.

The play involves running with the ball or passing it to another player behind you (never forward) and this continues along a line diagonally across the field. It can also be kicked.

Play stops only for a goal, a rule violation, or out-of-bounds. Play restarts with a drop kick or place kick at centre after a goal. For serious rule violations a penalty kick is awarded. For minor ones a scrum results.

The scrum is that heaving mass of bodies interlocked, pushing and straining against each other over the ball. The scrum half throws the ball into the middle and the players must kick it out (but not out either end of the scrum, only the back). If in the course of play two or more opponents meet each other with the ball on the ground and started shoving for the ball it is a loose scrum.

When the ball goes over the sidelines the non-offending team throws it in over the centre of two lines of players, each line from one team. The players jump for the ball to knock it back to one of their own team in the backfield.

Tackling the man with the ball makes him release it if he cannot play it himself, or it touches the ground. All other forms or direct violence are barred, and rugby players wear no protective equipment.

The violations that cause stop-ages are legion, but the common ones are off-sides (when a player is in front of the ball after his own team last played it), violence or interference with a player not holding the ball, not releasing the ball when tackled, forward pass, and knock-on (knocking the ball forward instead of catching it cleanly).

The ball, incidentally, is not a bloated American football, it's a rugby ball, and considerably wider around the middle.

The number of players is fifteen, although interfac play features a faster game with seven a side. The referee is sole judge of law, with two touch judges to help.

The rules are actually far more complex than this brief explanation. Go out to a Blues game this year and watch for yourself. The season starts next Saturday at Trent; the first home game is Saturday, October 6 on the back field at 1 pm against Royal Military College.

The U of T track and field team captured the Tait McKenzie trophy for the OUAA title last season. The only losses this season are Bill Johnson and Peter Spitz from the record-holding sprint foursome, and discus record-setter Grant Tadmán. The gap should be filled by new names such as Doug Reed, Canadian junior decathlon record holder, and Greg Lockhart, who amazed the high school track world with a 3:49 time in the 1500 metres last year.

Hurdler Rick Cunningham, high jumpers Mike McVarish and Carl Georgevski plus a host of other rookies and the returnees from last year promise a banner year. The first meet is Friday, September 28 at McMaster. In case you hadn't noticed, WLU is no longer Waterloo Lutheran, it's Wilfred Laurier. Royal Military College joined the OUAA as a full member for the 1973-74 season.... Blues football goes against Queen's next Saturday in Kingston. The loss of halfbacks Warrender, McLellan, and Booth could weaken the Queen's attack, although flanker Barry St. George from Ottawa and halfback Gerry Blacker from WLU are valuable transfers.

An interesting sidelight will be the performance of all-star defensive halfback Peter McNabb, who played last year for Toronto, against his old team-mates.

Food Science saga continues

By RANDY ROBERTSON
Food Sciences graduate Irene Miller charged last week that the Faculty of Food Sciences is being divided so that it can be conquered, all for the benefit of the university administration.

Miller, who was a member of last year's Cruise Committee, the latest committee to consider the Faculty's fate, claimed that the concept of Health Sciences "came from certain factions of the administration designed to strengthen their own position".

The Planning and Resources committee recommended to the Governing Council over the summer that the Nutrition, Dietetics and Food Chemistry programs of the Faculty of Food Sciences be combined with the Department of Nutrition of the School of Hygiene to form a new Department of Nutrition and Food Science with academic objectives as proposed by the Cruise Report.

The Cruise Report suggests that such a department should be made part of a Faculty of Health Sciences if such a faculty is set up within the near future.

The Governing Council, in sending back the recommendations of the Planning and Resources committee — recommendations favoring in effect the dissolution of the faculty as an organizational division of the university — suggested that the committee take additional time to clarify the total plan within which the proposed changes must be looked at.

John Hamilton, who originally proposed that the Faculty be phased out, was vice-president in charge of Health Sciences when he made the proposal.

Hamilton is now vice-provost of the university.

Faculty of Food Sciences Dean Iva Armstrong said that though Hamilton claims he has no overall interest in Health Sciences yet "as vice-provost he is still concerned with them, though he is not specifically designated as such."

Health Sciences, which Miller described as a "committee that put itself together", deals with the Faculties of Medicine, Nursing, Pharmacy and Dentistry.

Armstrong claimed that her Faculty and the Faculty of Health and Physical Education "have never really been accepted into this group."

She attributed this to the fact that both faculties were "afterthoughts."

Health Sciences is presently attempting, together with the Faculty of Arts and Science, to set up a one year pre-professional program for students desiring to enter Dentistry, Medicine or Pharmacy.

The Faculty of Food Sciences has not been asked to participate in discussions relating to this program, even though, the pre-professional program is planned to include basic courses in subjects such as chemistry which might be useful to Food Sciences students.

Armstrong noted in a letter last fall to the Presidential Advisory Committee to Review the New Program in Arts and Science that the science courses offered by Arts and Science are often too specialist-oriented for Food Sciences' students.

Because Food Sciences has not been invited to the discussions for these non-specialist courses, they may not be very helpful to the faculty's students.

A bone of contention between the Faculty of Food Sciences and the Faculty of Arts and Sciences is the latter's refusal to give credit to Arts and Science students taking Food Sciences courses. The Food Sciences faculty recognizes Arts and Science courses.

All of these various issues caused Armstrong to exclaim "We are ready to co-operate but co-operation is a two-way street. What we have is unilateral cooperation."

Miller too complained that there is "no reciprocity."

"The faculty is isolated because no one will cooperate with it. Everyone is busy empire-building."

Rally for Morgentaler

The U of T Women's Coalition has organized a rally Thursday in support of Doctor Henry Morgentaler, a Montreal physician charged with two counts of conspiring to perform and performing an abortion in 1970.

The case has been a lengthy one, with several appeals to the Supreme Court. Earlier this year he was again charged with performing an abortion. A woman was forced by police to testify against him despite her belief that she had a right to an abortion.

Morgentaler, a prominent advocate of freer abortion laws, has performed a number of abortions and allowed CTV's W5 Public Affairs show to film an abortion at his clinic. The film was seized by police and will be used as evidence against him.

On August 15 the police again moved in on Morgentaler, arresting 15 others and charging Morgentaler with four more counts of performing an illegal abortion. This raid stimulated an angry response from women's groups across the country.

On August 30 several more charges were laid against him to bring the total to 13. He is being brought to trial on September 24 without the customary preliminary hearing.

Morgentaler has defended himself throughout, charging that abortion laws are "unjust, cruel, and dangerous to women." He took what he called "the only morally defensible course: to offer a helping hand in spite of the law."

Women's groups across the country are planning demonstrations protesting the charges against Morgentaler on September 22. Defense committees are also being set up. The U of T rally will be held at Hart House Thursday at 1 p.m.

These student-farmworkers are in Toronto to revive grape and lettuce boycott.

Grapes: forbidden fruit

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

Richard Paredes and Miguel Contreras are finding Toronto a lot colder, but a lot more hospitable than their native California.

Both are student-farmworkers, who arrived in Toronto September 6 to organize the second boycott of non-union grapes and lettuce. They are working with a campus committee of students and professors whose 55 members will receive a $750 donation from SAC.

Contreras, 21, had worked in the fields as long as he can remember. Even when he became a journalism student at California State University at Fresno, he continued working to finance his education.

Paredes, also 21, has worked in the fields since he was 13, and was a fellow student with Contreras at Fresno, where he was studying speech therapy and communicative disorders.

Both have spent over a month in jail, after three separate arrests for striking in the grape fields. They both participated in a 15-day fast, protesting the illegal arrests and the repressive treatment of the farmworkers.

"After the success of the first boycott, which ended in 1970, we gained contracts with the growers. This gave us the dignity of being unionized farmworkers, and not slaves," continued Contreras.

"We have now lost these contracts, and we will get them back. That's why we're here, because Toronto is the fifth largest consumer of Californian grapes. We came because in the strike in the San Joaquin Valley we were beaten and harassed by the sheriff deputies, and hired thugs."

It is uncertain how long the UFW organizers will remain in Toronto. Paredes estimated it would be less than the last time, which was two and a half years.

"However before we came, we committed ourselves to work for the union until negotiations were settled," he said. "We sacrificed our jobs, our homes, our families."

Students have already demonstrated their interest and their support. SAC is sponsoring a campaign to stop campus cafeterias from selling grapes and lettuce, as well as Kraft and Dare products. Paredes noted that assistance is still needed in many areas. A clothing depot has been established at SAC, and children's clothes are most important. People are needed on picket lines in front of supermarkets, and to man the information tables in Sidney Smith Hall from 12 to 2 p.m. every day. In addition, a special Mass will be said for the farmworkers by Archbishop Poon, 2 p.m. today, at St. Michael's Cathedral (Shuter and Queen).

Vic tries to snare students

By MARINA STRAUSS

Complaints and confusion have resulted from a letter sent to all Victoria College incoming freshmen, suggesting they register in Victoria College courses.

The Victoria College registrar's office sent the letter this summer asking students to specify Vic courses he or she wanted to take or to give reasons why college courses had not been chosen.

SAC education commissioner Rick Gregory (Vic, IV) called the letter "crass intimidation of students." He said it was the College's attempt to coerce students and to get money from Simcoe Hall.

After receiving a complaint about the letter from a first year student, Gregory went to College president G.S. French for an explanation.

When French refused to rescind the letter, the College's student council (VUSAC) sent its own letter to freshmen, pointing out that students were not required to take College courses.

Judy Ness (Vic, I) was one of the many students confused by the registrar's suggestions. During registration, she was asked to switch a Political Science course from a Trinity to a Vic section. She preferred the Trinity section because of its professor and refused to change.

"Since I knew people who had gone to U of T before, I was aware that I could enrol in any section of the course I wanted," she said.

"But somebody could be intimidated into taking just college courses," she added.

Gregory opposed "the tone and the wording of the (registrar's) letter."

"It does not insist that students take college courses, but requests could be easily interpreted as orders," he contended.

Vic registrar A.C.M. Ross said the request was made so "students get to know us", since they have very little opportunity to get to know their college.

"Courses, like Classics, that were popular in 1892 are no longer popular today," Ross said.

Vic College courses include languages, philosophy, classics, and interdisciplinary courses, as well as political science and economics sections.

Ross admitted that the drop in students who take college courses "will affect us budgetarily."

"We get credit for every person we teach."

Out of 890 Vic students, only 200 are registered in college courses.

Food for thought

Faculty of Food Sciences Dean Iva Armstrong asked last week that the question of the Faculty's survival be decided once and for all. "The trial has gone on long enough," she said. The existence of the Faculty has been challenged since 1969.

Yet at the same time she was forced to confess the Faculty's powerlessness to do anything itself. The decision has to be made by the Governing Council.

Armstrong's comments came in the light of the Planning and Resources Committee's efforts to set up a working group to deal with a memorandum prepared by the administration and a reply to the memorandum prepared by Armstrong and Faculty of Food Sciences assistant-dean Martha Leitch.

The memorandum was prepared in response to the Governing Council's request for more information when it referred Planning and Resources' earlier recommendations back to the committee.

The Governing Council asked that the Committee take additional time to consider alternatives and to produce a crisp document making the issues "crystal clear".

A number of the Governing Council members who were not on the two committees which had discussed the recommendations in detail (the Planning and Resources and the Academic Affairs committees) felt that they had not received enough information to make a proper judgment.

Planning and Resources chairman W.J.D. Lewis noted that nothing will be going to the Governing Council in regards to Food Sciences in September because of the necessity for the working group to complete its consolidation of relevant information.

Food Science survival threatened since 1969

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The survival of the Faculty of Food Sciences has been threatened repeatedly since 1969. Committee has succeeded committee, and proposal has met counter-proposal.

In 1969, a committee was set up by then-president Claude Bissell to select a new dean for the faculty. The committee was chaired by Doctor R. G. Ellis.

But the committee was unable to determine just what kind of dean the faculty needed, and its uncertainties led to a general, but inconclusive discussion of the nature and value of the Faculty itself.

The Faculty, which has increased its enrolment from 96 three years ago to 260 this year, offers a variety of courses in textile science, community development, food chemistry and other subjects related to household sciences.

In 1971, former vice-president of health sciences, J.D. Hamilton, proposed that the Faculty of Food Sciences be phased out over a three-year period, and that no first year students be admitted in September of 1972.

Hamilton claimed that not enough students were registering and that it cost too much to educate the students within the Faculty in relation to other faculties because of a low teacher-student ratio. Also courses similar to those the Faculty offered were available elsewhere in the province — at Guelph, for example.

Hamilton's proposal led to the establishment by the Senate Executive of a committee to investigate the role of the Faculty in the university and the province. The committee was chaired by department of biochemistry professor J. Manery Fisher.

In contrast with Hamilton's recommendations, the Fisher committee's final report was very much on the side of the Faculty. It advocated that the university offer a program with two major objectives—to provide qualified home economics teachers and community workers, and to provide specialized graduate education for food scientists and nutritionists.

The report urged that the Faculty play the key role in all this, that it even be enlarged if necessary.

The Fisher report was neither approved nor rejected by the Senate, but simply received.

In 1972, the Academic Affairs committee established yet another committee to examine the feasibility and implementation of the recommendations of the Fisher report.

This committee, chaired by Faculty of Arts and Science Dean, James E. Cruise, reported in February of this year.

It recommended that the faculty be split up into two new departments—a department of Nutrition and Food Chemistry to deal with such subjects as dietetics, nutritional science and food chemistry and a department of Bionomics—a new name for home economics subjects like housing and community development, textile and clothing, family and child study.

The nutrition department was to become part of the Faculty of Health Sciences if such a faculty were established.

Until this happened, the department was to be identified with more than one faculty. The report suggested that the department staff should include persons identified with the School of Hygiene as well as the Faculty of Medicine, "thus establishing the university department in at least three faculties concurrently".

This department to be responsible for both undergraduate and graduate degree programs.

But two minority reports were presented with the final committee report.

One, by present Faculty of Food sciences assistant dean Martha Leitch, derided the setting up of an interdisciplinary and interfaculty department for undergraduates as well as graduates.

Such an administrative structure, Leitch claimed, created for several undergraduate programs would be unyielding, awkward, impractical and could place an undue burden on the senior administration of the university.

Faculty of Food Sciences dean Iva Armstrong has openly criticized the actions of the Cruise committee.

One wonders whether they are really implementing these motions or their own ideas," she said.

In a recent interview she claimed that the committee has seemed to have been thinking in terms of Hamilton's original proposal.

After the committee presented its final report Dean Armstrong made a reply supporting Leitch's minority report.

A committee of Faculty of Food Sciences professors, headed by J.J. Moran, prepared a rebuttal supporting Leitch and Armstrong.

The other minority report submitted by Faculty of Management Studies professor Jacob Siegel recommended that what was needed was not "additional support, a 'new trial period,' a dean with the mandate to develop home economics, but radical surgery."

Siegel urged that the Home Economics program be phased out in order to obtain a saving of according to his analysis, close to $200,000 over a five year period.

Siegel's report also supplied data to the committee, intended to demonstrate "a shocking lack of research productivity" on the part of some of the staff.

Armstrong attacked Siegel's conclusions, claiming that his report was "unsubstantiated criticism."

Siegel she said, gave his opinions without the benefit of "any intimate knowledge of the situation, without ever consulting me for an opinion. I have never met the man in my life."

She said that the lack of publication on the part of some of the staff members does not mean research is not being carried out.

"In time faculty research will result in publication," Faculty of Food Sciences professor J.D. Vitalis said.

"Faculty is also engaged in advising students who are researching," he said.

"And often faculty is engaged in research purely for the learning experience it provides the students".

Siegel drew "unwarranted inferences" from his observations, Vitalis claimed.

Vitalis noted incidentally that two faculty members (himself one of them) are presently Ph. D. candidates.

The problem of what's going to happen to Food Sciences is stalled in the Governing Council. Whether the Faculty will be divided into two, and the Department of Nutrition and Food Chemistry be linked with the School of Hygiene, will not be known until a Governing Council working group collects information for the Council.

Meanwhile, the Faculty of Food Sciences carries on the corner of Bloor and Queen's Park Crescent in the building bequeathed the Faculty by Lillian Massey early in the century.

This controversial property has been named a historical site. Can the Eatons get at it now?

Eatonland 'historic'

The Toronto Historical Board voted last night to add 188 Yonge Street, the building owned by U of T, to their list of architectural and historically significant buildings.

The Society also recommended that other buildings, all located on the site of the mammoth Eaton-Fairview development, be added to the list which will be submitted to City Council for approval.

When a building is designated as an historically or architectural significant building, Council can halt demolition of it for 60 days, in the hopes that some discussion will take place.

Douglas Richardson, of the U of T Department of Fine Art, described the Reitman's building at 188 Yonge as a "vibrant and vigorous example of late Victorian architecture" with "crude vigor and power".

He described it as "atypical in a city of appalling uniformity."

U of T has been looking for ways of sidestepping the will of Naomi Bilton, who in her 1922 bequest of the property to the university, stipulated that it was not to be sold to Eatons.

Whereas some might call this condition a "spite clause", Richardson suggested it "may represent a considered opinion of what the donor considered the most prudent."

Richardson points to the parcel of land on the south west corner of Yonge and Queen. It was irrevocably bequeathed by Jesse Ketchum to Knox Presbyterian Church, which was to retain it in perpetuity.

According to Richardson, the church receives a "substantial and ever increasing income" from its strategically located property.

Many citizens have raised doubts about the ethics of Varsity editor Bob Gauthier's staff recruitment campaign. He's just too suave!

Tears of a clown

This man is laughing on the outside but crying on the inside. He knows how tough it is to run a hard-hitting, no-surrender newspaper without the proper staff. And things are a little short at his paper without the rush of recruits eager to work. This man is Mr. Varsity.

Pictured above is the charm and hot breath of our editor, Mr. Bob "Lotsalaffs" Gauthier. By night as a devil-may-care gigolo, he circles the university looking for fun, excitement and "the Big Scoop."

By day he is the mild, unassuming editor of the much-reviled Varsity, the rag everybody loves to read and hates to admit it. Poor Bob is lonely these days (ever since Brylcreem cut off his free supply). He sits in his office dejected and muttering about "those hip-capitalist logical-positivists" that won't let his hair shine. Really folks, it's getting sadder every day.

What Bob needs is some fresh new blood around the office, a swarm of happy, laughing faces willing to do his bidding, and willing to make the sacrifice to turn his paper into the most feared organ in Hogtown.

So line up, sign up and enlist today, folks. "Lotsalaffs" needs a few more. You can help turn this rejected, dejected social paranoiac back into the suave blade you see above just by coming in and offering to work for him. See how easy it all is?

You can do so much for him, writing news stories about all the excitement on campus, sports stories or feature articles on any subject that pleases you and his fancies. We could use people to help snap those gripping Varsity photos you see and help with that eye-pleasing Varsity layout. Do it for Bob, do it for the Varsity, or do it for Mom, but do it!

Traffic is the dragon. St. George Spits the University's most heavily populated area into two sections — students in their thousands cross and re-cross the street daily "As a tree with the passage of time"

Look elsewhere for education

A few weeks ago the Star carried a story on page one in red headline ink commenting on the fact that at universities all across the province, with the exception of Queen's, enrolment is down from last year.

We've heard a few rumours that Carleton University in Ottawa is being out-hustled by its sister university of Ottawa (and, it's the bilingual one). We've also heard that enrolment is at only around the 50 per cent level at Brock and Laurentian. Something must be missing in the province's educational production line factories.

We remember the good old days when everyone wanted to come to university to learn. Judging by the campus this year so far, most people are coming to have a good time and, maybe, put in a few hours at Fort Book between football games or drinks.

It seems that the intellectually serious people have perceived the bankruptcy of the university for the people it has been designed for that broad category known as the middle class.

Middle class youth are now discovering in high school that they don't want the type of education offered by the university. Travel and independent study seem to be more productive not to mention the experience one picks up outside the ivory tower.

The universities are apparently recognizing student dropout rates. York, for example, has begun to offer scholarships to gain students; they know that's one of the only ways to keep the university growing.

Other inducements are rare though, and, basically, universities and their administrations don't want to grow too much larger. U of T persists in using the phrase "steady state" enrolment so much so that it's become a self-fulfilling prophecy. The Forster Report on Academic Appointments, for example, is offering the projection in an Appendix that enrolment between now and 1982-83 will increase at a yearly rate of less than one per cent. Perhaps we're in for a stable, quiet decade on the campuses of the province.

We don't wish to appear too smug or cynical, however, in deriding the present value of our most learned academic institutions, but merely to warn people who might be considering leaving before the mid-October Arts and Science course cut off date, that, and it should be obvious, the university is not the place where it's at.

Innis shows student, local participation works

Innis College has been called the experimental college on campus. The first college to come up with experimental and interdisciplinary courses, critics often scorned its innovative, even radical ideas.

Student input has always been a vital part of this college's functioning. Its students have parity with faculty and administration on all its decision-making bodies — a unique situation on campus.

Housed in an old building on 63 St. George Street, the college always boasted a warm, friendly atmosphere, cramped as it might be in its small quarters.

Eight years after its inception, construction will soon get underway for Innis' first permanent home. And the college is extending its principles of active student participation and community awareness in this process.

Architects worked on their designs in close consultation with a group of students, faculty, and administration who formed the building committee. Both former Innis principal Robin Harris and project architect Jack Diamond confirm the building is a better one because of student input.

The plans for the $1.2 million complex of three low-rise buildings, to be erected across from the Robarts Library on Sussex Street, are in themselves quite different from previous university construction.

The project will integrate existing houses into a new structure. A grassy area dominates the central portion.

Houses now on Sussex will be renovated and used as residential accommodations. But the college has assured the families and students living there that they are welcome to stay and be part of the Innis project (although the ultimate aim is for a ratio of two-thirds students and the balance non-students and families in the residences).

Communication with the surrounding neighborhood was in the forefront at every stage of drawing up the designs. As Diamond emphasizes, the structure will blend with the community; its modesty is its biggest asset. "It is not a secluded monastic garden", he has said. "It is open and inviting".

Innis is constructing a rare, perhaps non-existent, feature in the university's more recent buildings that have gone up in past years. One must only look across the road to the imposing, $43 million Robarts fort. Students never had a say in its development that is, not until they realized in 1971, after it was completed, that undergraduates would not be able to use it.

Diamond himself contrasts the Innis complex to Massey College, built in 1963, which he calls "an elitist enclave".

The university should take the Innis project as an example in its future building plans. For far too long, the campus, especially the northwest section, has blindly spread out, insensitive to the community's needs. In the most recent incident, in 1970, houses were torn down on the south-east corner of Sussex and Spadina for the construction of an air-conditioning plant. The university must not continue to uproot the people, the majority being low-income families, surrounding it in order to expand its imperious rule. This merely isolates it even more from its surrounding neighbors.

It is interesting to note that original plans for an $8 million Innis building with two towers that would have soared high above the Robarts Library were shelved in 1968 only because of budget cut-backs.

Principal Peter Russell now shudders when he thinks how easily the College might have gone ahead with the eight-storey towers. It would have been a grave mistake to have built according to the original design, he contends.

Again this points to the crucial need of the university to look to the community, to consult with it, and to integrate it into its future expansion plans. And students must have a viable voice in these actions.

The university must learn from its errors, as well as from its almost-committed errors.

It was most disappointing last Friday evening when, after The Varsity printed an open invitation to attend Innis' sod-turning ceremony which marked the new building's construction, interested students were turned away. The College had set up barriers to fence off the street, allowing only Innis members, Sussex Street residents, and a good representation of the Simcoe Hall heaves to enter.

True, the Innis student council could not afford to feed and an infinite number of people. But this does not answer for its refusal to allow the public to attend the ceremony itself and to see the project's designs and model being displayed.

For such an innovative project, such an elitist action represents a contradiction in policies.

We made our first gross error of the new publishing year and it was only the third issue.

On Monday's letters page we used an inaccurate and misleading headline "Communist Party opposes junta" on a letter we received from David Galbraith on behalf of the Committee for a Democratic Chile. We regret the headline. The Committee for a Democratic Chile is composed of a group of concerned individuals and is not a group established under the auspices of the Communist Party.

We were also accused by a couple of people of red-baiting because of the headline. Judging by the paper's content we do find this a little hard to believe. The headline was a mistake pure and simple.

A spokesperson for the Young Socialists also commented that, if the head attached to the letter from Mike Edwards was read along with the head of Galbraith's letter, it might be inferred by "deduction" that because the "Communist Party opposes junta", and "Trot criticizes Communist Party", therefore the YS might be pro junta. The headline on Edward's story referred to the content of his letter and not Galbraith's letter or the head on his letter.

Chile committee opposes junta

We view the violent and illegal seizure of power by the military junta in Chile, in which President Allende and thousands of others lost their lives, as a most tragic breach of democracy in our hemisphere. The government of President Allende was attempting to affect social change through constitutional processes and the military coup d'etat must be seen and opposed for the anti-democratic, anti-social, and indeed murderous, travesty it is.

In Canada we must exert pressure on our government to withhold diplomatic recognition from the junta to raise and support measures of censure in the United Nations, and to withhold any kind of support for the junta.

We feel that University of Toronto students and faculty have an obligation to help in these endeavors and in the attempt to discover the facts of the present situation in Chile by: working with the Canadian Committee for Solidarity with Democratic Chile; circulating petitions; making representations to all levels of government; writing letters and sending telegrams, pursuing and publicizing research; calling meetings and demonstrations of solidarity and any other steps that might help.

Accordingly we and other concerned members of the University of Toronto call on you to join us in furthering the work of:

The U of T committee for a Democratic Chile.

RMG calls for united defence

In view of the mass slaughter of workers, students and peasants going on today in Chile, the need for unified defense of the Chilean workers' movement is essential. Everywhere in Latin America, large numbers of workers and peasants understand the need to overthrow the imperialist order that has enslaved them in poverty and starvation for generations. Increasingly they are confronting the totality of imperialism's hold on them, including the regimes of local ruling classes and their armies.

The pre-revolutionary situation that has developed in Chile in the last three years under the democratically-elected regime of Allende represents the emergence of Chilean workers and peasants into the vanguard of this continental struggle. Beyond the immediate horrors of the current mass murder campaign by the generals, the destruction of the Chilean workers' movement would have grave implications throughout Latin America, as military rule strengthens its continental hold.

The Revolutionary Marxist Group urges every left-wing organization, student or labour group to unite in public defense of the Chilean workers and peasants, despite the somewhat substantial disagreements between the groups involved in such efforts to date. Different views exist on the priority of pressuring bourgeois governments (ie Canada's) not to recognize the generals' regime; and on the need to publicize the nature of the class war developing in Chile and to oppose any imperialist intervention (CIA, ITT, Sheraton, etc.). While such views must be put forward and debated, unity should be maximized around the agreed-upon themes of no recognition of the Junta and immediate asylum for refugees and exiles.

Broad-based united fronts have organized large meetings on the coup in Chile elsewhere in Canada, notably Vancouver, Regina, Montreal and Quebec City. In Toronto a Committee for a Democratic Chile was organized by the Communist Party, which included the Canadian Peace Congress and which approached several religious organizations for support. No groups likely to disagree with the CP approach were involved, and attempts by the RMG to publicize non-exclusionary meetings were obstructed by crude Stalinist manoeuvres (unplugging microphones, etc.).

The sectarian approach of groups who force their politics on criticism of the political errors of the Allende leadership in Chile such as the hysterical denunciations of CP meetings by the Communist Party (Marxist-Leninist) and the holier-than-thou letter by Mike Edwards of the Young Socialists in Monday's Varsity should be no excuse for excluding groups who disagree with the Communist Party. The CP's call for restoring democracy in Chile is totally out of touch with the realities of armed struggle, which will result either in the consolidation of bourgeois rule or its destruction and replacement with a state based on workers' and peasants' councils. An independent workers' movement, committed to the destruction of every aspect of bourgeois rule (including the army, whose "neutrality" can no longer be argued) is a prerequisite to a successful transition to socialism. While the RMG will not hide this view, the emphasis of its presentation must not hinder the construction of a strong defense movement.

We feel the Vancouver demonstration, with 500 people chanting "Oust the Generals, Workers to Power", shows the viability of our views for this task. Nevertheless, we urge the greatest unity in action in Toronto, against the recognition of the junta and the slaughter of the workers.

The left unceasingly drones on about "contradictions in capitalism". But the reaction to the coup in Chile nicely illustrates several contradictions in the current socialist party line.

The very people who support revolution all over the world (except, of course, in Peoples' Democracies like Latvia and Estonia) are now wringing their hands at the overthrow of a "constitutionally elected government". Since when did the fact that a government was constitutionally elected make an iota of difference to the left? Chiang Kai Chek was constitutionally elected too. When are the editors of the Varsity going to denounce his overthrow?

Also, those who are now doing "analysis" pieces on Chile sputter in outrage at the truckers' strike which was used as a disruptive device against Allende. Yet the left constantly uses techniques of disruption — sit-ins, guerrilla theatre, riots. I remember that several years ago the freshman orientation at UC was disrupted by "progressives" who wanted it stopped. Why is it more outrageous for the truckers to close up shop in an effort to stop Allende from confiscating the property of the middle class?

Was a military takeover in Chile desirable? Of course not; but Allende was not the saint his fashionable supporters in this country portray him to be. The Varsity now condemns the military for its inaction in allowing rightist attacks on the left. However, no protest was heard in those heady days after Allende took power when the MIR was given free rein in the hinterlands for their attacks on the upper and middle classes. Allende virtually withdrew the protection of the law from his proponents when his government took no action against the MIR.

takeover in Chile. Fair enough, I am also no lover of military governments. But I remember the silence, the total absence of any protest from the left when the tanks rolled into Prague.

Even the Toike needs hacks

In previous years the TOIKE OIKE has come under severe criticism for its material and lack of quality. I will not try to defend the TOIKE, the material or format for this format has been used for many years, but I set a challenge to all critics and so called great minds of this campus. It is far easier to criticize someone else's material than try and rectify a problem. If you feel that the TOIKE was not up to an acceptable par submit some material of your own. I direct this specifically at Mr. Van-Kai Nguyen. His editorial was very well written. Could you produce something just as good for the TOIKE on some subject related to engineering? I further this challenge to all students especially engineers. This is your newspaper. It is only as good as you make it. Most articles on any subject related to engineering or on a humorous note will be well received. It is easy to sit back and criticize how about trying something constructive and contributing. We need writers, cartoonists, and reporters. You pay for the TOIKE, as Mr. Nguyen said, why not make something you can be proud of.

Audience likes bad guys in Götterdämmerung

By DAVID BASSKIN
If audience reaction could alter the plot of an opera, then the bad guys would be the winners in the Canadian Opera Company's new production of Götterdämmerung, currently at the O'Keefe. The story is the fourth and last part of Wagner's Ring Cycle, a titanic story of the God's loss of earth and Man's ascension. Götterdämmerung is the part that brings all the threads of the story together and in order to do this, it runs close to five hours, making it the longest opera ever written.

For those heavily into Wagner and the Ring (and the two don't necessarily go together), seeing this opera is a must; for those who aren't committed to it before they walk in the door, it's a musing.

The trouble with this production is that it doesn't do much to counter the potential boredom of five hours of opera. The sets are interesting, but not enough is done with them to keep us interested. The costumes are good enough, and the lighting is suitably mystic and moody, but what is totally wrong is the staging.

The Ring consists in large part of big arias and some duets that place one performer in a position and leave him there for minutes at a time, singing away.

In short, it's pretty static. A little more motion on the stage could have made this production visually exciting. Instead, we got excellent singing, resourceful playing from the Toronto Symphony, but far too much in the way of dull acting.

One large exception to this was the acting of William Wildermann as Hagen, the lead villain. The man just oozed evil and nastiness, even in his movements. His walk, the way he folded his arms, his facial expressions all fit so well with the character that the audience singled him out in its cheers at the end of each act.

Less successful, but by no means unsuccessful were the two romantic leads, Jean Cox as Siegfried, and Ingrid Bjoner as Brunnhilde. Their singing was excellent, especially in the first act duet where Siegfried says his farewell before making his way down the Rhine. This was probably the high point in their singing in the whole evening, although Ms. Bjoner did rather well in the Immolation scene, which is over ten minutes of grueling singing.

Don't take these criticisms as being a total condemnation, though.

Götterdämmerung is the most difficult opera to perform, and considering that the Canadian Opera is only 25, it's quite an achievement just to stage it. If you enjoy Wagner, you'll probably enjoy this show because the singers are good enough so that you're not hanging on the edge of the seat praying that they'll get the notes. A special mention should be made of Lili Chookasian, who plays the First Norn and Waltraute. Her gorgeous mezzo voice was sure and expert in these roles, making it a pleasure to hear her.

In short, an opera for opera fans.

If you don't quite know if opera is for you, go see one of the other productions: Götterdämmerung is simply not for everybody, although the Canadian Opera really does give it an all-out try. If you still want to see it, there's only one performance left: this Thursday at 7 p.m.

Handbook too red

I am a first year student and I am sick of student councils trying to push Socialist and Left-Wing ideas down my throat, and I'm sure a lot of other people are just as mad as I am.

I refer especially to the orange handbook Everyone's a Winner at the U of T. Under the thin disguise of being a dull, poorly written and sloppily put together collage of facts and Junior High School level "wit", the booklet was really a propaganda sheet for the "Young Socialists" who quite clearly are not socialists at all, but communists and probably even Maoists.

I think that first year students, like everyone else, should be allowed to make up their own minds; and I don't think that the "Young Socialists" should be allowed to put out such a handbook.

Leckie organizes Chinese parents

Chinese children may get bilingual instruction

An unprecedented bi-lingual, bi-cultural program may be started next year for Chinese children at Orde and Ogden public schools in downtown Toronto.

The program, awaiting approval by the Ontario Department of Education, is the result of a five month organizing effort involving Ward Six School trustee and U of T faculty member Dan Leckie, two community workers from the University Settlement House, Linda Chu and Ellen Liu, and a large number of area parents.

The proposal, drafted by the newly-formed Chinese Parents'

Association in consultation with the Toronto Board of Education's New Canadians Committee, calls for volunteer instructors to conduct classes in Chinese culture and language during school hours at the two predominantly Chinese schools.

Ellen Liu said that the plan originated in 1972 when a Local Initiatives project conducted a door to door survey in the area that revealed a large demand for Chinese instruction in local schools.

There was no follow up, however; and real stimulus for the present project came early this year when a school board survey again revealed a strong sentiment for Chinese language instruction.

This time Leckie talked to Liu and Chu and they followed up with several months of intensive canvassing and talking to area residents.

At first, Liu said, the parents were very "passive." They were reluctant to attend meetings and take part in any planning and organizing. Then several small meetings were held with the parents at the University Settlement House, located on Grange Avenue in the middle of the Chinese community.

A leaflet was sent out and a public meeting held at the Orde Street public school on June 18. Four days later the Chinese Parents' Association was formed and an executive elected. The parents decided to petition the Toronto Board of Education for Chinese instruction in the schools and quickly gathered 200 signatures.

It was at this stage, Liu says, that the parents became more active and support mounted for the project. A number of the parents met with the principal of Orde and encountered strong opposition to the parents' demand for instruction during school hours starting at grade one. He wanted to start at grade five or six despite the fact that French instruction begins at grade one.

In early July, with the help of two board officials Mel Lafontaine and Joe Sterioff the group drafted a proposal to submit to the New Canadians Committee. The proposal was passed by the board in August.

The rationale for the program, as outlined in a six-page brief that was submitted to the Ministry of Education, is that Chinese students would be able to learn better in a bicultural atmosphere and should not have to "desert" their language and culture.

Liu said that one of the most important objectives of the program will be to "bridge the communications gap" between parents and children. Many of the parents do not speak English and children resist speaking Chinese after their immersion in the English environment of the school.

She pointed out that present Chinese classes after school are not successful because of the financial burden on the predominantly working class parents.

"It is psychologically better for the children to learn Chinese in school because if it is after school while the other kids are playing, it could be regarded as a punishment," she added.

The proposed program would be run entirely by volunteers and financed by the community. This provision is necessary according to board official Sterioff because of the nature of the project. He explained that if one ethnic group received funding any other ethnic group would be entitled to the same and the board budget wouldn't extend that far.

Sterioff said that the board's role was mainly to "act as an advisor to the community as to what would be educationally sound." He said that a similar program was also being planned by Greek parents in the east end of Toronto.

Trustee Leckie has worked closely with the community organizers and the parents' association and acted as their supporter at the board. Several meetings have been held with other levels of government to get funding and approval.

Sterioff added that provincial approval has not yet been given though the proposal went to the department in August. He said that the province may balk at approving the program and it has already been discussed by the cabinet twice.

The reason for possible denial would be that at present English and French are the only languages authorized for use at a public school level. This program would set a precedent but the board and the parents are pushing for approval on the grounds that it will be community-directed, bi-cultural, and will take no more than 30 minutes a day of class time.

Support for the program may come from several sources. Liu said that pending approval they are seeking funds under the federal government's multi-culturalism program. The United Action for Canadian Chinese, a group of Chinese professional people, has already announced that it will donate $3,000 and the expertise of its members.

The program is hoped to start next year. At present a working group composed of parents, board officials and others is trying to formulate possible curriculum. Chu said that the greatest gain has been that the Chinese parents are aware for the first time that they can do something to "change the system".

Already the Parents Association has begun acting on other problems and is involved in more discussion with the teachers and administration of the two schools. Parents yesterday angrily protested dangerous equipment at a newly constructed playground and also demanded reinstatement of the free milk program chopped by the board last spring.

Chilean history reveals background to coup

BY LATIN AMERICAN WORKING GROUP

"Our history may be summed up thus: an obscure nation was born in the extreme south-west corner of America, which its own discoverer Diego de Almagro forsook after scarcely a glimpse, because it was poor, far from the colonial centres, and because it was difficult to subdue.

"...Born as it was under the cloak of poverty, it knew that it had to be frugal, hard-working and civilly peaceful, in order to save its resources and because its people were few."

Gabriela Mistral, (1889-1957)
Chilean poet and Nobel Laureate, 1945.

The Chilean Workers Movement

Central to an understanding of the dynamics of recent Chilean history is recognition of the radicalizing force of the workers' organizations. Recent visitors to Chile have experienced the flute-drum and voice-accompanied ballet of Santa Maria del Iquique, the Chilean revolution's equivalent of "The East is Red". It recreated — as the groundwork for socialist vocation — the incredible massacre of 2,000 men, women and children, who were machine-gunned in 1907, when they demonstrated for better conditions against the British nitrate mine owners in Iquique.

In conditions like these Luis Emilio Recabarren, among others, attempted socialist labor organizing. Elected to Congress in 1906 Recabarren was barred from office, and in 1912 he founded the Socialist Workers' Party. In 1921 he affiliated the Chilean Workers' Federation with the Communist International Trade Union Movement.

It was only in Chile, out of all Latin America, writes Regis Debray, that the Communist party grew out of the workers' movement. "Chile is the only country of the continent...in which those parties which are referred to as 'workers' parties' because of their ideology, are actually organically workers' organizations by extraction and social base. It is the only country in which the dominant class has had to respond for nearly half a century to the threat of a movement of workers' resistance..."

The workers' parties have been essentially the Communist Party, founded in 1922, and recognized electorally in 1931, and the Socialist Party which was created in 1933 on a more nationalistic base. The Socialist Party, in which Salvador Allende was a leading founder and member, originates in a 12 day Socialist republic which was declared in Chile by a Socialist military officer, Colonel Marmaduke Grove in 1932.

"Our privileged classes have lived intoxicated with the luxuries and the soft life provided by foreign capitalism in exchange for our natural resources and for the misery of the people"...the apt analysis of the program of Grove's republic.

In 1936 the leaders of the Communist and Socialist parties in Chile agreed to form a Popular Front with the advanced bourgeois Radical party and some smaller parties, winning power in the presidential elections of 1938. Over a period of three years, the wages of industrial workers were raised as much as 43 per cent, and CORFO, the Chilean National Development Corporation was formed to stimulate industrial development.

The experience of the Popular Front was a powerful influence on Chilean workers' parties to keep trying the "via pacifica" (peaceful way) as the only legitimate way to power. This, despite post-war repression which temporarily banned the Communist Party. It had won 71 per cent of coal miners' votes, 63 per cent of nitrate miners' votes, and 55 per cent of copper miners' votes in municipal elections in 1947. The right was frightened, thousands of Communists were arrested, and poet Pablo Neruda banned from his Senate seat.

In 1952 Salvador Allende ran for President for the first time, leading a Socialist-Communist coalition. He got 5.4 per cent of the vote. In 1958 he ran again with a coalition of left and workers' parties, coming within 35,000 votes of victory.

In 1953 the CUT, the central grouping of confederations and groups of unions, was formed on a socialist basis. Because of its militancy, its leaders were severely repressed until the early sixties. At first retreating under pressure to a less activist position, it advanced in militancy during the 1960's, with a membership characterized by a dominant and well-organized Communist wing, a growing Socialist wing, and a minority of Christian Democrats and others.

The CUT has been the most representative organ of the Chilean working class, but was not recognized in the Chilean constitution. Allende tried to legalize it in Congress after taking power, but the right wing and the Christian Democrats rejected the bill. Despite this limitation the CUT was one of the foundations of the Popular Unity's victory and its administration. Still, it represented only a quarter of Chile's workers, and there was ample room for active mobilization beyond its ranks.

The politics of the sixties: the bankruptcy of the via media

The past 50 years have seen a gradual democratization of Chilean political life, in large part due to the pressure of the organized and extending workers' movement, and more recently the growth of consciousness among the peasants.

The enfranchisement of women in 1949 allowed an increasingly articulate elite to participate in political life, but the masses of Chilean women remained in passive poverty, with the rationalizations of Catholic tradition to separate them from support of the left. Allende's electoral failures prior to 1970 were in large part due to the votes of the wives of the very workers who supported him.

The election of 1964 was the most bitter in recent history. Eduardo Frei: leader of the rising Christian Democrat (CD) party campaigned for agrarian reform and strike rights for workers, and promised community organizations for urban slum-dwellers, and housing construction. Christian Democracy claimed to be a via media, between the Marxists and the old guard of Chilean Society.

Frei talked about "revolution in liberty"; what he provided was stagnation in liberty. His party had origins in the Falange, a group of idealistically educated Catholic professionals in the 1930s, who were described as fascist-minded by John Gunther, no raving-radical himself.

With the extension of the Chilean franchise, the Falange became the mass-based Christian Democrat party, gaining over 20 per cent of the vote in the Presidential election of 1958, and drawing support from a wide variety of class backgrounds, from women and from the peasantry.

In 1964 Frei's candidacy was supported by the right, in an attempt to block Allende on the left who had almost won in 1958. To make things more certain, US aid poured into the country throughout the year, and studies of Canadian aid to Chile show the usual parallel pattern.

The US Engineering and Mining Journal reported: "Privately, top Washington officials admit Frei's election was greatly helped by the 'serious efforts' of US copper interests aiding the US Information Agency."

Frei was elected with a combination of foreign support and a careful campaign to cultivate paranoia about the left who would, it was supposed, destroy Chilean institutions with tanks in the streets.

Frei promised a great deal, but when faced with concerted opposition, he knuckled under. He was caught on one side with the growing demands of the groups he had sought to mobilize — women, peasants and marginal people, with an increasingly militant labour movement pushing for a larger share of the pie, economically and politically. On the other hand Frei faced the institutionalized power of the right based in landed holdings in inefficient agriculture, industrial control, and alliance with key foreign investors and banks.

In between the two the Christian Democrats fell to bickering, wracked by the same class conflicts which characterized the society as a whole. Christian Democracy, and Frei, sought to integrate the lower and unorganized classes into the dominant system of exploitation, but their radical rhetoric outran them, and the pent-up frustrations of the Chilean poor became exasperated with the compromises of Frei's regime.

Economically and socially, Frei was proved bankrupt. The great plans of 1964 settled down to a growth rate of less than 1 per cent per capita, in 1967, 1968 and 1969. Inflation in the 1960's totalled 1,000 per cent. In the first eight months of 1968, there were 2,539 industrial conflicts in Chile, with 4.4 million man days lost. Peasants began to occupy land, with 70 tomas or occupations in 1969 alone. Frei's government reacted with a heavy hand, and the paranoid right conspired in an unsuccessful coup with the co-operation of General Viaux.

Frei's political base began to crumble. The CD had gained 43 per cent of the popular vote in the Congressional elections of 1965, they received 29 per cent in 1969. Frei received 56.1 per cent in the Presidential election of 1964. Tomio, the CD candidate in 1970, received 27 per cent. The shooting of occupying peasants in Puerto Montt in 1969 led to a major split in the party, and a Christian left willing to cooperate with the Marxists created the Movement of United Popular Action (MAPU) led by land reform architect Jacques Chonchol and other prominent former Christian Democrats.

Despite an attractive and candidate Radomiro Tomio in 1970, Christian Democrats Allende and the right's Allende election the party underwent left, when the Christian Christiana was formed by 1971, and like MAPU, joined coalition.

Founded on Catholic socialist Christian Democrats were Christianity.

Surveyed by a Jesuit in per cent of Chilean Christians cooperation with Marxists while only 5.3 per cent was Marxism as "Perverse". The stated "The task of our party construction of socialism tribution of forces, inspired in Christianity.... For us Christian inspiration means that we are committed to struggle for the liberation of the people, for the construction of a just society."

Thus Allende's coalition, unlike Frei's Christian Democrats, picked up support while in office. In the 1969 Congressional elections the Socialists and Communists received about 28 per cent of the vote, while in the Congressional elections of March 1973, the Popular Unity Coalition as a whole gained 43 per cent of the vote, with the Socialists alone picking up 10 per cent over their 1969 position.

Frei's Christian Democrats became more and more rigid during their opposition to Allende. The few progressives left in the party, the wing of Tomic, Leighton and others became more isolated, verging on a further split in August, 1973.

The Eduardo Frei of September, 1973, was a leader of a party wracked by class conflict, a party proved bankrupt economically and socially before 1970, and a man beholden time and time again to the interests of the American empire. Frei survived in the sixties by plunging Chile into the highest per capita debt of any country on the third world. His regime was the darling of the Alliance for Progress.

It is not difficult to understand why the American press and many Americans with interests in South America keep speculating about Frei's return to the Presidency. Christian Democracy is no longer believable. Beholden to the fascist right and the military, in September, 1973, both Christianity and democracy in Chile have left it behind.

Companero presidente: Allende in office, the people gain power

"For the first time the foot of the executive branch of the state was lifted from the neck of the working class", Stephen Torgoff wrote of the accession of Allende, November 3, 1970. Allende did not claim that his election made Chile a socialist society, although many North Americans seemed to think that Chile was suddenly transformed by the accession of Marxists into some netherworld behind a copper curtain.

The strategy of the Popular Unity was to transform the Chilean state, to open its legal doors and let the working class march in. Utilizing the legality of the traditional bourgeois state, Allende's coalition hoped to create bit-by-bit the elements of a new structure.

Even the Revolutionary Left Movement, the MIR, which stood outside the government, leading occupations, and giving critical support to Allende, realized that a period of democratic gains in which the left was free to organize was essential to the foundation of a socialist state where the masses would be prepared to take power.

Five basic changes were prescribed in the Popular Unity program:

- establishment of Chilean independence from foreign capital,
- broadening and deepening of democratic rights,
- extensive agrarian reform,
- immediate amelioration of the burden from the working class,
- restructuring of the economy and state to initiate the transition to socialism.

By the end of 1971, the Chilean economy had been effectively removed from foreign ownership. By unanimous Congressional resolution the big US copper firms, Kennecott and Anaconda, were nationalized. The banks, both Chilean and foreign owned, were nationalized. Gas, iron, steel, cement and electricity became state-owned, and the large textile mills in Santiago were taken over following accusations by their workers that the owners were sabotaging production. ITT's telephone company was nationalized, and large fishing companies were turned into fisher-owned cooperatives.

The Popular Unity attempted to organize the economy into three sectors: a social or public area of the 150 largest companies in Chile, those which controlled the economy: a mixed area of smaller firms and cooperatives where private and governmental capital were involved; and the private area comprised of thousands of small businesses. Threatened by these moves, the opposition-controlled Congress placed every road-block possible to prevent the extension of public control.

In socially-controlled industries, councils were set up, elected from plant workers and administrators or section heads in equal numbers. Within government guidelines these councils ran the firms. Production committees were elected to help set quotas and administer them, and to supervise working conditions.

Within the factories CUT began a campaign for democratization. Wage differentials between women and men were abolished, and child care centres, long a paper dream, began to become a reality. Medical and dental services in the plant were introduced in many factories which did not previously enjoy any medical plans.

During the first year of Allende's government, despite predictions of chaos, the new work-place atmosphere, and demand stimulated by income redistribution saw the Gross National Product increase 8.5 per cent. Unemployment which had increased considerably under Frei, was reduced to 3.5 per cent.

The Popular Unity undertook to redistribute income and consumption in Chile. It set rent limits, rice controls, and initiated across-the-board wage increases. A 40 per cent wage hike established when Allende took office, resulted in an increase in average family consumption in 1971 alone of 13 per cent, in spite of continued inflation. Surveys by the Christian Democrats showed Chileans happier and living better at the lower end of the economic spectrum, and progressively more annoyed at the upper end. If the poor were eating meat, then the rich might have to suffer the inconvenience of their maids standing in line for supplies. Hoarding and black marketing increased, and from this situation grew community committees, the JAPs, to control prices and make distribution more secure for the poor and the workers.

The agrarian reform undertaken by the Popular Unity took a Cristian Democrat law, and pushed it to its limits. Every estate equivalent to more than 198 acres of irrigated land, was expropriated. The Popular Unity, with the leadership of agriculture minister Jacques Chonchol, did as much in its first year, as the Christian Democrats had done in six.

The Popular Unity was convinced that the old style reform utilizing co-operatives with a limited membership, tended to perpetuate the old estates, and create a rural peasant petty bourgeoisie, with the state in the role of the old estate owner. Thus the Popular Unity organized larger units, Centres of Agrarian Reform, which would integrate many of the landless contract workers and tiny private landholders.

This aggressive policy was urged on by peasant union organizations and by the MIR, who saw to it that in areas where reform was slow, they occupied land in much-publicized tomas. The MIR and several other groups called for a total reform which would not indemnify the old owners, arguing that if the peasants paid the state, and the state paid off the old owners, then nothing had changed.

"The children will be the only privileged ones" Allende declared, and his government was characterized by a heavy emphasis on public health, and child care. In the first month in office, the government inaugurated a program of a half-litre of milk per day, free, for each of Chile's children. After one year in office, Allende reported a 10 per cent drop in the infant mortality rate.

Neighbourhood clinics, a health train touring remote areas, and an emphasis on good diet and good health for the marginal people characterized the approach of the government. Community councils attempted to organize effective mass preventative care, but the sort of professional back-up to these efforts was often lacking, as doctors preferred often to stick with traditional approaches or leave the country.

The Popular Unity Government made a forthright attempt to attract more of Chile's women to its programme and the parties which composed it. Allende's cabinets frequently included women — perhaps most notably Mireya Baltra as Minister of Labour — and the victory of a Communist woman in a Congressional by-election in 1972 was a useful psychological lift.

In 1971 Allende set up a Ministry of the Family, despite the objections of the Congressional opposition, to co-ordinate the many existing groups and centres relating to women and the family. A law was instituted to allow nursing mothers 84 days of rest following birth of children, and an ambitious programme of child care and kindergarten centres was instituted with the goal of increasing the percentage of women employees from 26 per cent to 40 per cent. For women remaining at home, Allende advocated sickness subsidies, economic aid and pension benefits. For expectant mothers he instituted a Family Allowance to encourage them to eat better and care for themselves.

The list of objectives, programmes, and achievements could go on for pages, through relations with the Mapuches, housing programmes, educational plans.

The career of the Popular Unity in foreign affairs, as an outstanding leader and example to Third World opinion, and a vocal goad against US policies in various international organizations is perhaps more well known. With a knowledge of the limitations of a country of 10 million, a dash of bravado, and a sense of humour, Allende attempted more on the world stage, than Canadian cabinet ministers have dreamed of in 20 years.

Landlord jacks up rent unexpectedly

Earl St. tenants negotiate to stop evictions

By CHRIS PROBERT

Tenants threatened with eviction from an apartment at 5 Earl Street near Jarvis and Wellesley met with their landlord Monday night to negotiate leases and rents acceptable to everyone.

The tenants, some of whom are students are now paying between $120 and $130 a month. They were suddenly given notice to vacate by Venture Properties Ltd., the landlord, at the end of August. Venture had taken over the building at the end of April.

At the Monday night meeting, Andrew Valevicius, the younger brother of Joseph, President of Venture Properties, offered tenants one-year leases at $180 a month, which he said was considerably less than the $200, which had originally been planned.

The tenants, represented by lawyer George Biggar, turned down Valevicius' offer, and asked for leases at $130. Neither side would change its final offer by more than $1.

A tenant at another Valevicius owned property who was present at the meeting said, "Although Andrew Valevicius said that he had authority to deal, when it came to the crunch, he didn't."

At the meeting, Valevicius did sign an agreement allowing those tenants who have been unable to locate new accommodation an extension of a month from the original eviction date, September 30. Five or six apartments are involved.

Valevicius mentioned that Venture Properties had been thinking of renovating 5 Earl Street, and making it into an apartment-hotel, like the Town Inn, at 620 Church.

At an apartment-hotel the longest stay is about four months, too long to rent a room in a hotel, but too short to take an apartment. The clientele is primarily businessmen transferred to the city for short periods.

In the past, community organizations have lobbied for a by-law rezoning the North Jarvis area to prohibit apartment hotels.

A further meeting is to be held between Venture Properties and tenants. No date has been set as yet.

A meeting of the North Jarvis Community Association tonight at 8 pm at Jarvis Collegiate will discuss the more general problem of deterioration of the neighbourhood.

The Students' Administrative Council is charging an inflationary $5 a ticket for a John Mayall concert so that cheaper shows can be put on later with the concert's profits.

SAC services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch defended the high ticket prices, explaining that "it's costing us a lot to put the show on." If the price was lowered to $4 SAC would lose money, he said.

SAC is paying $7,500 for the October 7 show, and will make a profit of $3,500 if the concert sells out. Kanowitch did not seem too optimistic that all the tickets will be sold.

"We wanted to make a good profit on this concert to subsidize other shows during the year," Kanowitch explained.

SAC plans a David Blumfield concert for December with a $3,000 loss.

"We will purposely be taking losses," Kanowitch said. "People who can't afford to go to the Mayall concert can go to our free concert this Saturday."

"The Mayall concert is for those who really want to see Mayall," he pointed out. These people, he believed, would be ready to pay the $5.

SAC helped to put on a $5-a-seat Van Morrison concert in July which sold out two shows.

Kanowitch chose Mayall, a blues artist, because he was the only "big-name" performer available in October. He had asked people coming into the SAC office, and the consensus proved it to be a good choice, Kanowitch contended.

Tickets for big-name concerts at Massey Hall cost from $3.50 up.

Laneway school needs help

By LIZ MORRISON

SAC's Education Commission promised Laneway Community School $250 late last month, but the school needs more financial help and local volunteers to continue its special remedial program for children in the Trefann Court area.

The school was set up five years ago to give children having problems in the regular school system an opportunity for individual instruction and attention. There are 15 pupils from six to 13 years of age attending the school, and others in a home tutoring plan. There are two teachers, one paid by the Board of Education, and the other a volunteer.

The Toronto Board also supplies textbooks and basic equipment for maths and reading programs, but money is needed to pay the second teacher's salary. Two teachers are needed, it is felt, to provide individualized programs for each child.

Laneway teacher John Maly, said the school needs volunteers with special skills or interests, particularly science students who could bring materials for natural science activities.

In its five years, the school has been successful according to Noreen Gaudette a parent of two pupils. All the children who have attended the school have overcome reading problems, and children who had a lot of problems with school now like school. There has been some limited success with teenagers, some of whom go on to a new high school to improve their English.

Funds have been raised by letter campaigns to councils and businesses. The Ontario Education Centre gave the school $2,000, and SAC has been instrumental in the creation of the school and in trying to get Government support for it.

People interested in working at Laneway should call 364-0910.

Nationalist union fights company, U. S. union

PORT ALBERNI, B.C. (CUP) — The Pulp and Paper Workers of Canada (PPW) here and in neighbouring MacMillan Bloedel Mills has taken on both the company and the established union, the United Paper-Workers International Union (UPIU), in their struggle for a better deal for Canadian pulp-and-paper workers.

The PPWC is a newly-organized, nationalist union dedicated not only to breaking the stranglehold of the American-based unions on Canadian pulp mill workers, but also to the reaffirming of the principle that union executives should be working people.

The Canadian union fought long and hard and finally ousted the American union at Harman B.C. but lost in efforts to take-over the Port Alberni and Powell River Mills representation.

The PPWC ties its executives closely with the people they represent. Executives of the PPWC locals cannot hold office longer than five years, and they do not lose their job seniority when they return to work in the mills. This permits them to return to a mill job at the same rate of pay they were making when they took office.

The UPIC requires full-time union executives to start from the bottom again if they return to mill work and there is no limit to the number of years they can keep their positions. This means that full-time union executives tend to remain just that, making the union members pay them as career representatives. PPWC organizers say this causes union representatives to lose touch with the workers.

Both the UPIU and MacMillan Bloedel have labelled the PPWC Communists and malcontents in an effort to discredit the Canadian union and prevent it from gaining a foothold.

The real fight began after the PPWC gained certification at Harman in 1969. Then, the provincial government's labor relations board raised the percentage of members required to gain certification from 55 to 65 per cent, making it more difficult for a new union to oust the established one.

Last summer, eight executives of the PPWC local at Harman were fired for encouraging their members to engage in what the company termed an illegal strike. When the previous contract expired on June 30, Harman workers took legal job action, such as work-to-rule tactics, to persuade the company that the union would have the backing of the workers in the up-coming contract negotiations. The company then charged 29 workers, about one-third of the Harman work-force, with illegally slowing down production.

When the union found out so many workers were being charged, union executives organized informational picket lines at the plant to advise workers of their right to defend themselves before the Labor Relations Board. The company said these picket lines were an illegal strike and fired eight executives of the local.

The Labor Relations Board and the B.C. Supreme Court agreed the strike was illegal but refused to grant the company an injunction because the strike would soon become legal.

The American-based UPIU also attempted to undermine the workers' position. When contract negotiations began at Port Alberni last June, UPIU executives advised their membership they would not accept the eight and one-half per cent raise the company was offering. Mill workers voted to demand a ten and one-half per cent raise.

But, then days later, the union reneged. They told the workers that publishers were down to a 30 day supply of newsprint. So the union could not, in good conscience, strike and they would have to accept the offer the workers had voted not to accept.

Workers at the Powell River mill accepted the contract: Port Alberni workers did not. When the total vote came out in favor of the contract, Port Alberni workers staged a wildcat strike. Union members felt they had been sold out by the executive and the union and the company were acting in collusion.

Some union members feel the UPIU accepted the "sweetheart contract" so that the PPWC, who were demanding better wages for the workers, could fit the radical, militant image both the company and the UPIU wanted to promote.

MacMillan Bloedel was probably not surprised that the Harman workers walked out in support of their fired union leaders. This gamble does not hurt the company at Harman as it would have at the other mills.

Harman produces only pulp and lumber, not newsprint, which is the bread and butter of the MacMillan Bloedel mill production.

PPWC will not be intimidated by either the company or the American union and the worker's dissatisfaction is increasing. Of the 700 work stoppages in MacMillan Bloedel mills last year, only two were legal. More illegal stoppages occurred where the PPWC was strong. The wildcat strike at Port Alberni is evidence that workers feel their American union is not acting in their best interests.

Chile saw Canada's 'purity'

By LATIN AMERICAN WORKING GROUP

An article from Le Monde's weekly selection for October 12-18, 1972 reads, "After the cutting of lines of credit from the World Bank and other international organizations of finance, some Canadian and Dutch banks have also decided to stop credits allotted to Chile because of the Kennecott affair."

With regard to Canada, this statement was incorrect — many banks were quite willing to give short term loans to Chile at high rates of interest. It was the government agency, the Export Development Corporation (EDC), which refused to grant credits to the Chilean government.

The following description appeared in the House of Commons Debates record for March 14, 1973; it was given by W.B. Nesbitt, Conservative MP, for Oxford:

"The government of Chile had approached a logging equipment firm called Timber Jack to make a $4 million purchase. It was prepared to pay 10 per cent and the EDC had apparently been agreeable in conversations with Timber Jack to finance the rest, but later Chile was turned down by EDC." Mr. Nesbitt reported that he had "discussed the matter with officials of EDC, and was informed that they were acting in accordance with government policy not to extend loans to Chile at present." He also added, "I would be surprised if the government of the United States has not attempted to put some pressure on the government of this country, through the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Gillespie), and asked us to restrict credit to Chile."

The EDC is the major holder of the Chilean debt to Canada. Its board of directors includes five representatives from the private sector. Among these was the late Arthur Mayne, former president of Kennecott Canada Ltd., director of Kennecott Copper Corporation and Braden Copper (Chile) and also a director of one of Canada's largest credit institutions, the Royal Bank.

Clearly his interest in companies in conflict with the Chilean government would not favourably dispose him towards loaning funds to aid that country.

The same attitude can reasonably be attributed to two of the five members of the board of the EDC. One is H.A. Zimmerman, vice-president of Noranda Mines Ltd. Noranda's subsidiary, Chile-Canadian Mines S.A., has operated near Pajosa, Chile since 1964 (recovering $4.1 million of the $4.5 million investment it made in a settlement with the Chilean government.)

Dick Sandwell, president of Sandwell and Company, which has a forest industry engineering project financed by the Export Credit Insurance Corporation of Canada, is another.

Other Canadian interest in Chile include Bata Shoes (largest producer of footwear, with a net worth of $3.78 million in 1972), Acres International, Atlas Exploration and British Columbia Packers, Canadian Javelin Limited of Newfoundland was involved in a joint venture to develop copper deposits near Antofagasta in 1970.

Canadians should remember that their country has control over some of the wealth and technical resources Chile needs: in 1970 Canada's exports to Chile totalled $22.9 million (while her imports were a mere $2.8 million worth); the most important Canadian export in value terms was automobiles and parts, followed by machinery for mining and construction.

Both Canadian industry and credit institutions were in a position to pressure the Chilean government by withholding funds and supplies, and did not hesitate to do so.

At the time of the military coup in Chile, the Canadian ambassador was in Argentina. In the interest of preserving Canada's reputation for purity, an official must not be around when trouble starts.

Faculty funnies is an offshoot of the SAC campaign to inform the students of the university of their non-role in staff decisions. Faculty Funnies was drawn by the notorious Tom McLaughlin for SAC, although once it arrived SAC pres Bob Anderson found he wasn't pleased with it.

Faculty Funnies are only mildly so, depicting with much irreverence the very close nature of the faculty establishment in hiring, firing and looking out for number one. Example: "Tenure is lifetime membership in the academic guild granted by senior colleagues on the basis of publications and general willingness to get along with professional poobahs."

Sounds like the sort of thing you like to read while huddled up in the back of a sleeper lecture? Then hop it over to the SAC office for your free copy of the all-new, improved Faculty Funnies.

Community residents finally win Windlass fight

Windlass Holdings Ltd. has been trying to redevelop the rubble-strewn vacant block at Dundas and McCaul Streets for three years, and last Friday, City Council finally approved a new, modified apartment and commercial complex.

Approval came after six months of long, drawn-out meetings and tough negotiations between community representatives from the Grange Park Residents' Association and the Chinese Community Association, and the Windlass development promoters—president Jack Friedman, veteran developers' lawyer Jack Weir, and the scheme's architect Boris Zerafa.

The developers were forced to negotiate, or else by-laws permitting high density and commercial uses in the Windlass plan could be repealed by Council. And through the negotiations, residents in the inner city neighbourhood, who have none of the professional expertise taken for granted by citizens' groups in well-to-do residential areas of the city, were able to wrest some concessions from a private developer, an event that has been called "historic" by Ward Five Alderman Ying Hope.

In May 1971, the old City Council, not known for its sympathy to neighbourhood residents, passed by-laws which would have permitted three 29 storey apartment buildings with a shopping mall on the ground level.

When the contentious development came before the new City Council in April, the decision was deferred, at Mayor David Crombie's suggestion, in the hopes that neighbourhood groups and the developers could negotiate and come up with something acceptable to both sides. If compromise terms were agreed upon, the 1971 by-laws could be amended to suit both the residents and the developers.

The Windlass proposal as it was originally set out, would have had one of the highest densities of all residential developments in the city—even higher than St. James Town—and would have cut a towering swath through a neighbourhood which has traditionally been the stopping place of various immigrant groups coming to Toronto. The development would have severed the Chinese community, now occupying the area, from their business district along Dundas Street to the east of McCaul.

The Windlass scheme would also have provided exclusive luxury accommodation, mainly unsuitable for families, and too expensive for residents presently living in the area.

When Crombie set up the working committee under his mediating chairmanship, community negotiators demanded a reduction in density, a less imposing design which would fit more harmoniously into the neighbourhood, and some provision for subsidized housing and family accommodation suitable for people now living in the area.

A few weeks after negotiations began, Windlass architect Boris Zerafa obliged with a scaled-down development with a density about 25 per cent less than the original plan. The finalized design is an agglomeration of low-rise buildings, none higher than 12-storeys, with town houses and apartments.

About 10 per cent of the approximately 600 units will have three, four, and five bedrooms, suitable for families, and the stores on the ground floors of the buildings will be appropriate for local merchants.

Only after concessions from both sides, and a little arm-twisting from Windlass, was it agreed that 20 per cent of the apartments would be rented under the Ontario Housing Corporation's rent supplement program. Under this scheme, the developer agrees to lease a portion of his project at market value to OHC, and OHC then rents to tenants at one quarter their income, absorbing the loss. In return for leasing up to 25 per cent of the building to OHC, the developer can get low interest second mortgage financing for up to 95 per cent of his construction costs.

Community negotiators wanted the maximum of 25 per cent to go to OHC under this program, but Windlass insisted on 15 per cent. A compromise of 20 per cent was agreed on, when Windlass produced another design for the development that would have required no by-law changes, or approval from City Council.

One of the local residents, Kay Parsons, who has been involved in the long Windlass struggle, says that she is very cautious as to whether this final agreement for subsidized housing will be carried out because of her "previous work with developers."

OHC has confirmed a "definite interest" in the Windlass plan, and has agreed to pay a higher subsidy for Windlass accommodation, because of its central location. However, OHC participation cannot be finalized until accurate estimates of rent levels are tendered to the corporation.

As negotiations were drawing to a close, both sides, the developer and the residents, armed themselves in case something broke down, or one side backed out. Residents in the community had applied for legal aid, and this spring were granted a certificate of $10,000, providing they raised a portion of it themselves. This money would go for paying legal fees at City Hall, or the Ontario Municipal Board, the provincial body that has the final say or may for any substantial municipal by-law changes.

Windlass had also applied for building permits for the development plan which would not require any by-law amendments.

When the Windlass plan finally came before City Council, the aldermen approved it with a rare display of near unanimity. The only dissenter was Ward Six Alderman William Archer, who objected to "the proximity of housing and play areas for children to the commercial component, and the lack of short term parking" which would be required for a theatre included in the development.

Archer complained that the "committee didn't get around" to his objections, but concentrated on the concessions they wanted from the developer. He sent a memorandum to the committee on August 30, but according to Kay Parsons, the development had been approved by the Planning Board by that time and was to come before the City's Buildings and Development Committee.

Archer also criticized the community negotiators for not encompassing broad representation of the community—businessmen, for example—and the mayor's staff, notably Marilyn Carley and Michael Dennis, for not consulting with aldermen. The development is in Archer's ward.

However, negotiations were carried on in open meetings at City Hall, and Archer was present at some of those meetings.

Parsons also pointed out that small businessmen were represented on the negotiating committee.

In spite of Archer's complaints about the inadequacy of the working committee in this situation, and the "Nixonian" qualities of the Mayor's staff, this pattern of negotiations between private developers and affected communities is what the new City Council hopes to achieve by blanketing various areas of the City—Yonge-Eglinton area, the Annex, the South of Carlton area, and the City core—with 35 and 45 foot height restrictions. Called holding by-laws, they would force any developer who wanted to construct a building higher than the specified limit to come to the bargaining table.

These by-laws are not binding, however, until the Ontario Municipal Board approves them, and although the first height restrictions were passed by the City in the spring, none has yet come before the OMB.

The community negotiators are generally satisfied with the outcome of the negotiations at Windlass. As Parsons observed, the situation is better than it was. However,

Windlass took care to demolish all of the houses on the site before requesting rezoning in 1971, and as Parsons said, it would have been better still to have the houses.

Another resident also commented that none of the crucial issues of money and profits were ever discussed on the working committee. It was a subject that was delicately sidestepped.

Some concessions, however, were gained for a community that has been a target, not only for developers, but for government and public organizations. The Art Gallery is expanding in the area; Hydro had designs for a generator on a block north of Dundas west of Beverley; the Metropolitan police bought up a block of stately old houses on the east side of Beverley for a new police station; the Toronto School Board is planning expansion.

The whole fabric of the community south of U of T between University Avenue and Spadina has been torn and preyed upon, but now, residents are getting some response from City Hall.

Rochdale drives rednecks into apoplexy

Rochdale College is in trouble. With three police murdered in the past year and a startling increase in the use of hard narcotics in the city, the inhabitants of Toronto are becoming more insistent about the need to eradicate the "cancer" growing among them. And a lot of people think that the first place to start is at Rochdale College, more affectionately known as the "hallucination Hilton."

Rochdale College was founded in the late sixties as an alternative to the rigid U of T style of education. Although anyone could attend the courses at the College it was designed as a complete environment, experimenting with other styles of living as well as learning. When the college moved into the building at 341 Bloor Street West in September, 1968, everyone watched — unfortunately for Rochdale.

Almost immediately the project ran into trouble — first crashers, the bikers and speed freaks, then the biggest drug dealers this side of the Yucatan. Rochdale became notorious as a haven for those seeking sanctuary from the law.

The mismanagement of the building was extraordinary. Rent wasn't collected for months on end. No one knew how many people lived in the building. Receipts weren't kept. Bills weren't paid. Management techniques that worked well in a Campus Co-Op house completely broke down when applied to an eighteen storey high-rise.

At this point no one outside of the College appeared to appreciate that the Free University still lived. Courses continued to be offered and attended. The Coach House Press and Theatre Passe Muraille both got their start there. These achievements went largely unnoticed. Rumours of what went on within those concrete walls became more lurid. The bogeyman was said to be living on Bloor Street West.

The press, the public, and the police were and still are irritated by Rochdale. Few things get Toronto's upright citizens on their high horse as fast as Rochdale. Police chiefs, sundry MPs and local politicians, reporters for democracy's watchdogs, all indulge themselves denouncing the College.

Rochdale College Council members resent these ringing calumnies. Council vice-president Michael Randell admits that in previous times the criticism was well founded. But that was some time ago.

Cocaine and speed merchants have been out of business for years, Randell claims. "Never was any junk around", he adds.

Now all of the big smoke dealers have been evicted, a hypocritical action given that Rochdaleans don't recognize marijuana as being harmful.

But the keynote now is survival. The residents are closer together and more organized than ever before, working towards the original purpose.

The image of Rochdale in most minds is a hard one to shake. Consider the coroner's jury in July of this year investigating the death of a young man who fell from the building's upper stories. The jury could find no reason for the fall.

There was no trace of drugs. The deceased lived in Scarborough, not Rochdale. Nonetheless, the panel's main recommendation was to "close Rochdale College immediately". The Globe and Mail duly reported same — in headlines.

It appears that the only time a reporter for the city's press has spent any time in Rochdale was earlier this past summer when Douglas Long of the Globe stayed a week there (undercover, of course). Rather than exposing the Ontario Connection, he wrote about a group of young people trying to live life close to their own ideals. The story changed few prejudices.

This brings us to the police. Forsaking the earlier massed assaults on Rochdale as rather gauche, a permanent surveillance team was organized, featuring twelve men and a sergeant. Through constant harassment of people in or near the building, more than a thousand charges were laid in the first five months of 1973. Most of the charges dealt with simple possession of marijuana. An entire car would be busted for one joint. Each person busted would have two counts laid against him. Not surprisingly, the percentage of convictions obtained was low.

However, the police got carried away in the enthusiasm of the moment and started searching everyone in sight. After complaints were made by indignant and innocent citizens, the police presence became less noticeable. The Varsity asked Randell if some compromise had been worked out with the police, "Yeh", he affirmed, "we do as they say and they don't shoot us".

The police will not be caught napping, however. In May it was revealed that the department had contingency plans for an "invasion" of the College, should the need arise. Clarkson Company, the court appointed receiver for the building, called off the invasion when it was pointed out the College was crawling with babies.

Finances, Courts, Etc.

The Supreme Court appointed John Biddell, president of the Clarkson Company, as receiver of the college in September 1972, pending foreclosure actions. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation wanted to sell Rochdale to satisfy its huge first mortgage on the property. Four other mortgage holders were waiting in the wings. All CMHC had to do was get possession.

So why isn't Rochdale closed? Revenue Properties, holders of the second and fifth mortgages, are not certain that a sale of the College building would bring in enough money to satisfy its debts. So a suit is being brought to declare CMHC's first mortgage invalid on the grounds that the money was advanced before the act which allowed CMHC to make the loan was passed by Parliament. Should it be successful, Revenue's mortgage will take precedence. The trial resumes at the beginning of October. Whatever the outcome, the Council feels the college will be there until at least May.

There have been recent rumblings from Ottawa about a "Rochgate" scandal. Urban Affairs Minister Ron Busford smells "something untoward" in not only Rochdale, but in the province's four other co-op residences. Could it be that the developers took the money and ran? Did the contractors use inferior materials? STAY TUNED And pack a lunch. Busford's investigation will likely deliver its report a while from now. Quietly.

Rochdale Now

College Council president Jay Boldizar stressed the fact that although Clarkson Company is in charge of running the building, the College is still running itself. We must not confuse the building and the college. As a place for learning, more courses than ever are being offered to anyone interested, mostly free. Included in the official calendar are a film-makers co-op, harmonica lessons, a radio station, an animal rescue service, Captain Tommy's Waxworks (candle factory), theatre groups, printers' cooperatives and about thirty others. This is a startling achievement considering that funds for the program come from no outside sources.

Survival is the theme of many of the courses; survival in the grip of the bureaucratic octopus, survival in a hostile land.

Fellow travellers are very welcome. Nickie Ashley in room 216, the Council Office, will set you up in the activity that catches your fancy along with the times, places, and people. Chretien says NYA funds mismanaged

Natives angry at Chretien over distortion

OTTAWA (CUP) — When about 200 hundred young native people occupied the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development offices here August 30 and refused to let department officials enter, Jean Chretien, the department's cabinet minister, told the press that the occupiers did not have any genuine grievances but were just trying to get more federal funds.

Chretien later tried to discredit the Native Youth Association, the group who organized the occupation, by accusing them of mismanagement of government funds. Chretien said his department had authorized funds for a native youth conference in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, but the NYA cancelled the conference and used the funds to fly to 'communist controlled' East Germany.

NYA and National Indian

Brotherhood officials say Chretien is at least mistaken, if not lying.

The Sault Ste. Marie conference was called so that native youth leaders could talk to government officials and the NYA received government funding to cover delegates' travel expenses. But when the Indian Affairs Department declined an invitation to attend, the conference was cancelled.

The money granted for this conference was then used to fly Native Youth representatives to Ottawa for an organizational meeting.

NYA representatives did use government money to go to East Berlin to attend the World Youth Festival. But NYA president, Art Manuel, says that the Indian Affairs Department gave his association $3000 specifically for this purpose. Manuel says that this grant was negotiated by the National Indian Brotherhood.

Indian Brotherhood executive director, Marie Marule, says she and another Brotherhood employee negotiated the grant with Indian Affairs assistant deputy minister, John Ciaccia.

Marule says she told Ciaccia the purpose of the grant, "but he didn't seem too interested at that time."

Ciaccia and his boss seemed interested after the NYA occupied their offices.

On CBC Radio recently, Ciaccia tried to discredit native youth leaders by saying they are "people who visit East Germany and other communist countries."

Art Manuel says that the NYA didn't really care whether or not East Berlin is communist-controlled: "It was a festival for youth from all parts of the world. It gave us a chance to demonstrate our culture and to learn about other cultures."

During the August 30 occupation, some confidential files were taken from the Indian Affairs deputy minister's office. Chretien has publicly accused organizers of the occupation with taking the files and has cut off all funding to the NYA. One of the conditions on which funding will be resumed is the return of the files.

Manuel thinks it is unethical for a government minister to accuse individuals of a crime before charges are laid. He says the RCMP may not even suspect the NYA of the theft. "They didn't even search us when we left the building and they knew then that the files were missing."

Teach-in on Chile

A Teach-In on the situation in Chile, sponsored by the Latin American Working Group, in Chile, sponsored by the Latin American Working Group, Chilean students in Toronto and the Latin American Studies Course Union is being held this afternoon at 1 pm at the Medical Sciences Auditorium. Thousands of workers, students, and peasants are being killed by the generals in Chile, while scattered resistance continues in some parts of the country. The world-wide importance of these events cannot be underestimated. All those interested in films, information and discussion by Chilean students and Canadians knowledgeable on Latin America should make a point of attending.

York searches a third time President must be Canadian DOWNSVIEW, ONT. (CUP) — For the third time in the short history of York University, the post of administration president is up for grabs. A committee composed of four members of the Board of Governors, one representative of the York staff association, three faculty members and three students was created last spring to look for one.

The last presidential search was made in the fall of 1969 following the retirement of Murray Ross, York's first president. At that time, the Senate was uncertain whether there should be an open discussion of the candidates and whether the Senate or the Board of Governors should make the choice.

This time there will be no open discussion, and the search committee will make a recommendation to the Board after receiving guidance from the Senate and Board executive committees.

In December 1969 the names of the three presidential candidates leaked to the public before the Senate made a decision. As a result of the leak, one candidate withdrew.

John Saywell, one of the two remaining candidates, charged that slanderous tactics were used to influence the outcome of the selection and he withdrew.

The third candidate said that controversy over procedural methods left him uncertain whether he or any other candidate would have the support of the community and he also withdrew.

The Senate eventually chose David Slater, who resigned under pressure last January. The current acting president, John Volton, is expected to step down at the end of this academic year.

interfac report

Interfac preview

Interfac sports competition for men starts next week with soccer, football, and touch football. In keeping with revered sports traditions, Varsity provides a preview of the season.

In first division soccer the defending champion Engineering I team has lost five players through graduation to reduce it to the level of the other teams. Runner-up Erindale has most of its players back while perennial contender St. Mikes A rounds out the elite threesome at the top.

Neither Vic nor Scarborough is likely to challenge for top spot unless a remarkable crop of rookies emerges to replace departed stalwarts. UC has returned to the first division after two years' banishment, but it will need more than last year's crew to finish out of the cellar.

The second division featured an unusual six-way tie for first last year: UC, Meds, New, Dents, St. Mikes B, and Law. The doctors won the final against the gnus, but any of them could take it this year, including Trinity and Junior Engineering, who finished out of the running last year.

The addition of PHE, down from the first division, and the return of Grads after a year out of competition makes this league very much anybody's guess.

The third is the fun division of interfac soccer. Last year Forestry came on late in the season to take it all in the mudbowl play-offs over Engineering3.

The tree-cutters have lost some players while the plumbers, as farm team for the other two Engineering squads, tend to lack the necessary depth. Trinity B, with an almost full return of last year's veterans, ranks as the favorite.

Innis failed to complete the season last year; it could be the dark horse. Wycliffe and Knox have lost too many players while Emmanuel, Architecture, and Pharmacy have too many holes for the rookies to fill up.

The Mulock Cup, emblematic of interfac football supremacy, went to St. Mikes last year in a surprising upset. A powerful PHE squad swept through an undefeated regular season only to lose narrowly in the dying minutes of the final.

Even more surprising was the failure of defending titlists Vic to make the finals. For many years the Mulock had been a battle between Vic and PHE. The question this year is: Can Vic regain its former stature?

Coach Ron Gray believes so. He feels Vic has regained the spirit and dedication necessary to win back the cup. He expects to mould his winner from a solid core of experienced players, and a large crop of rookies.

PHE will not make it easy for them. Their teams are always well-drilled, and this year's edition will be light but fast.

St. Mikes returns to the fray with a large number of returnees, although the quarterback is new. Its lines are much heavier, always a crucial factor in interfac ball.

No word was available on Engineering, the other team in the first division, but they will have to perform miracles to compete for a play-off spot.

The second division is usually a war of attrition. Last year UC survived best to top Meds in the final. Both have retained enough of last year's men to be safe bets for the play-offs.

Scarborough, hiding out in the east-end, lost in the semis to UC last year, and could easily have a better squad this time around. Trinity, the other semi-final loser, has graduated so many players that its chances are marginal.

Forestry and New always suffer from a lack of depth, but one of them is going to have to have the play-offs. New seems to have the better turn-out, for a slight edge in the battle for the last play-off spot.

Touch football has grown enormously in the two years since its introduction. Law Jocks are the defending champs, but no predictions can be made since the teams are so numerous and fluid. On past track record, the doctors and lawyers are apt to dominate.

The U of T sailing team placed second in the initial regatta of the fall season last weekend. In a fleet of six schools Queen's and Toronto quickly left the others behind.

Skipper John Lazier and his crew Kathleen Muir led their division on Saturday. Ian Brown and Lou Odette trailed Queen's closely in theirs.

On Sunday a strong effort seemed about to pull Toronto ahead, but the rally fell short by one point. Final scores were: Queen's 25; Toronto, 26; RMC, 38; Trent, 42; CMR, 53; McMaster, 68.

Football Blues lost hard-driving halfback Libert Castillo for the rest of the season due to torn knee ligaments from the York game. He may return for the play-offs. Rookie Steve Kwiatkowski will replace him against Queen's.

For cricket enthusiasts, the Canadian Club Championship for the Ross Robertson trophy descends upon Sunnybrook Park Friday and Saturday.

Harriers win in Halifax

By BRAD MORLEY

The U of T cross-country team dominated its first exhibition meet of the season in Halifax on Saturday. Dalhousie University, the University of New Brunswick, and Bates University were the other seven-man teams in the 4.5 mile race at Point Pleasant Park.

A relatively young team coached by Andy Higgins defeated the opposition in convincing fashion. John Sharp won the race in 22:11 with Joe Sax coming second in 22:35.

Brad Morley finished fourth in 22:53, only a few seconds ahead of two fine freshman runners. Greg Lockhart and Mike Dyon finished fifth and sixth respectively with times of 23:01 and 23:14.

Frank Agano, a half-mile track specialist, ran a good race to finish twentieth in 25:25. Only Bob Book of Dalhousie cracked the top six positions by placing third.

The first five finishers' ranks were added for the team title, giving U of T an easy win with 18 points to second-place Bates, 54.

The Little trophy for the OUAA cross-country title returned to Toronto last year after some years elsewhere. This season bids fair to keep it here.

sports

Sports enjoyment measures success

By ANDY HIGGINS, DAVE WHITSON, AL LUNDQUIST, and JIM McCLEMENTS

In this article we are attempting to suggest methods that will increase the base of participation in sport by providing opportunities for individuals of widely varying ages and inclinations to participate in physical activities.

Essential to this expansion is the need for defining and broadening of the values and attitudes currently attributed to sport in Ontario. We hope that where the ideas discussed strike a responsive chord in people intimately connected with amateur sport, they will prove helpful in clarifying what could or might be done.

To pave the way for any such expansion of the base, we must first begin, in our public utterances and our person-to-person contacts, to promote participation in a sense that will be understood as all-inclusive. Amateur sports must, both explicitly and implicitly through the flexible nature of their programs, encourage people to participate in a variety of environments and with a wide variety of levels of skill and motivation.

Even where sports have initiated age-class or junior development programs, the money, the effort, and the attention have been focussed on the young athletes who were already highly skilled and/or were prepared to participate and train in a serious, goal-directed manner. The generally unintended, but surely undesirable result of this has been that many people who like sports and want to play but are not highly serious or highly skilled, find there is little interest in them and little opportunity for them to take part.

If sport in Ontario is to grow and expand with enthusiastic athletes, coaches, and administrators, we need to make it obvious that everyone is welcomed. We must behave in such a way that our words and actions strike a responsive and positive chord in people who have enjoyed or might enjoy playing games for any reason whatever.

We must begin to advocate an attitude towards sport that is natural; one that most of these people can identify with and can claim as their own.

The central theme will have to be enjoyment-centered; it will have to relate to the quality of the individual's experience. Non-professional sport must be allowed to remain a very personal thing. It is for the people who play. However many who have stopped playing and indeed many who are playing now need to be re-awakened to the fun of participation, the satisfaction of competition, the joy of effort.

It seems worthwhile therefore to try to articulate what it is that can make competition and participation sources of satisfaction and joy, so that we might facilitate or at least not impede these experiences.

Sport also affords one the opportunity of getting to know oneself. Through gradually developing new skills and increased fitness, we can develop an understanding of improvement per se and of our own capacity for it which is transferable to other areas of our lives. Often the impetus of good competition brings out in us capacities we didn't know we had.

Coming to know and accept ourselves can be a pleasurable and exciting experience so long as we are able to expand and explore ourselves at our own pace and in directions of our own choosing. The athlete's goals must be reasonable, and they must be his own, if he is to realize joy and satisfaction from their pursuit. He must feel free of the burden of having to win to feel enjoyment or self-worth. He must be allowed to see that losing is none of the things it has come to mean in our society.

There is no doubt that efforts by sensitive coaches to relieve or eliminate this pressure will run counter to the basic professional attitude which now permeates the sports pages, that "Winning isn't everything; it's the only thing". Such efforts will be essential though if we are to bring back adults who have given up sport because it is meaningless to them as it now exists, and prevent untold thousands of youngsters from going the way of their elders.

Too often the athlete whose commitment to competitive success has been less than that of his coach has been made to feel that this is a failing of character which renders him less worthy of respect. This message may be conveyed through direct criticism or it may become equally evident through the coaches' growing indifference. Either behaviour on the part of the coach may represent a deliberate ploy to spur the athlete by wounding his pride, or it may simply be an honest, even unwitting, reflection of his own dedication to the "winning" ethic.

Whatever the reasoning behind it and whatever form it takes, this very personal kind of criticism and the tension it generates are destructive more often than not, and cannot be defended in terms of the themes we have been stressing — inclusiveness, enjoyment, spontaneity, personal discovery and growth.

If coaches are to support, encourage, and facilitate rather than retard the development of their athletes, they must be real, authentic, genuine persons not role players, manipulators, or the like. They will need to demonstrate in a personal life style that they really care, and are real, sensitive, aware, and empathetic to the humanity of athletes as they experience the joy, pain, anxiety, fear, frustration, and excitement all of which are inherent in the sporting experience.

Sport is one of the potent human forces that can function to free and actualize individuals. The release of human potential, the achievement of individual dignity, and the liberation of the human spirit is within the grasp in an individualized humanistic approach to sport.

To accomplish these kinds of aims we must recognize and respect the individuality of each athlete. We must understand that his or her unique combination of fears and aspirations will not collide exactly with those of other athletes, coaches, and administrators. We must moreover put this respect into practice by making our programs flexible enough to accommodate these differences.

Thus development programs will not be training systems which require participants to progress in a manner which has been predetermined as "best" for all, and which reject or forget about those unwilling or unable to conform. They will rather be educational opportunities which encourage and assist each individual to progress according to his own desires.

The kind of commitment required to reach the top in most sports today cannot be supplied to a reluctant athlete by a coach or anyone else. Few people will continue to train as long and as hard as is necessary unless they have a spontaneous will to excel which stems from their own genuine enjoyment of the activity.

People who have thus had an opportunity to enjoy friendly physical activity, who have found themselves welcomed within the structure of organized sport whatever their initial levels of skill and motivation, may want to share their love and knowledge of the sport with others and will become the sensitive and enthusiastic coaches each sport needs so keenly.

Six-member panel of experts discussed situation in Chile at teach-in Wednesday attended by 250 people.

Violent repression in Chile

By BARRY WEISLEDER

The military junta in Chile is carrying on a program of violent repression, according to six Latin American experts, who spoke at a teach-in Wednesday afternoon at the Medical Sciences auditorium.

The 250 people attending the meeting were told that the death toll is rising in Chile, and that there are wholesale bombings of worker-occupied factories. Thousands of political prisoners are being rounded up; numerous political aliens, previously granted asylum, are being deported; and campamentos, shanty towns which are popularly controlled, are being quarantined.

Also prominent now in the Chilean situation, the panelists at the teach-in argued, was continued decentralized armed resistance on the part of workers.

It was suggested that military fatalities in the struggle were contributing significantly to the escalating figures on deaths, now estimated to be as high as 10,000, according to Enrique Neuberg, a Chilean student living in Toronto and one of the panelists.

The other panelists were Lisa North and Juan Maiguashka, both professors at York University in Latin American studies, who provided some historical background to the present struggle; John Foster and Tim Drayman, from the Latin American Working Group, who attempted to bring the meeting up to date on developments of a political and military nature in Chile; and Bill Young from the Latin American Studies Course Union, who chaired the meeting.

According to reports, armed workers' resistance appears now to be centred in the coastal areas of Valparaiso, Punta Arenas and Arica. But the military is also conducting the round-up of dissidents (arrestees estimated at 6,000), corralling them in sports stadiums, at naval and army bases, preparing to move them to the Selkirk Islands, or executing them by the score.

No leadership for the resistance has been provided by the heads of the parties that made up the Unidad Popular government of Allende, most of whom have moved underground to escape persecution. A prolonged period of urban skirmishes and guerrilla warfare from the countryside appears likely.

Although the panelists seemed agreed on the proposition, retrospectively, that the Allende popular front regime was actively preparing the way for a transformation of the Chilean state into a socialist one, they were unable to answer conclusively a question posed from the floor of the meeting, as to why Allende's forces hadn't begun the centralized construction of a new army of workers to defend the socialist gains of the Chilean workers and peasants.

General Carlos Prats, former chief of the military, key among those upon whom Allende depended for the prevention of civil war, and who had been reported earlier leading a division of troops loyal to the government towards Santiago, was now reported to be in Argentina, exiled.

The meeting did learn, however, that there was some disunity in the Chilean ruling class toward the coup, reflected partly in a split in the top leadership of the Christian Democrats.

On the other hand, there was no news available on the activity of specific groups on the Chilean left.

Two right-wing American-owned newspapers now being allowed to publish by the junta have been reporting only the efforts made by the authorities to liquidate the "Jewish-Communist conspiracy" to subvert the Chilean nation, Tim Drayman reported.

A group of Chilean students and supporters also said they planned to go to Ottawa on Thursday to petition External Affairs Minister Sharp to refuse recognition of the junta government.

They also intend to visit Jean Lanctot, Canadian head of the United Nations Commission on Refugees, to plead for asylum rights for Chilean dissidents.

MP John Rodriguez, (NDP, Nickel Belt) was said to be assisting the Chileans in their lobbying efforts.

People attending the meeting were also requested to send letters and telegrams opposing recognition of the military junta to their MP's and Mr. Sharp.

Groups move against Fairview

While Governing Council fiddles with what to do about U of T's strategically palmed windfall, 188 Yonge Street, other groups in Toronto are attempting to block the Eaton Fairview development.

Developers for the Eaton's superblock, Fairview Corp., came before City Hall's Committee of Adjustment on Wednesday, but an adjournment was obtained by opponents to the scheme, the Annex Ratepayers' Association, the Trefann Court Residents' Association, CORRA, and the soon-to-be incorporated group called Better Downtown Planning.

The adjustments that Fairview lawyer Thomas Deacon was requesting were so complicated that in spite of the plasticene maps and three dimensional air space models, no one understood the implications.

When Better Downtown Planning is incorporated, it will retain a lawyer to oppose the development on the basis that it is a major development, and therefore a detailed planning study of the area is required by the planning act.

According to Wolf Erlichmann, a member of the group, no traffic studies have been made even though streets downtown will be closed off.

The Toronto Historical Board, which voted Wednesday night to add 188 Yonge and another building on the south-west corner of Yonge and Terauley Streets, to its list of historically and architecturally significant buildings, will be considering others of the interesting examples of early twentieth century architecture in the area at later meetings.

Parity denied for Act review

By BOB BETTESON

Ignoring the demands of its student members and the Students' Administrative Council, the Governing Council last night approved the setting up of a 15 member committee including only three students to review the 1971 U of T Act.

Barry Mitchell (SGS) proposed that the matter be referred back to the executive committee to consider student demands for more representation. However only the six student members supported the motion.

Gord Barnes (Vic III) called the composition of the committee "an insult to students". He said that approval would "lead to another horror show at Queen's Park".

In 1971 during the U of T Act debate only the pressure and threats of the U of T Faculty Association prevented students from gaining staff-student parity on the Governing Council.

Barnes stated he would "never agree to sit on the review committee" and threatened to resign from the council.

Howard Levitt (New III) charged that the structure of the committee would have a prejudicial effect on the outcome of the review.

Professor William Dunphy claimed that there had been no threats during the 1971 debate, only "different points of view". He said that the committee does have parity and criticized Barnes for his threat to resign.

Professor Charles Hanly said that the committee was only for "housekeeping" and the "politics and numbers of the committee are not a major issue."

President John Evans reported that plans were going ahead for new integrated athletic facilities on the northwest campus and will involve consultation with the Huron-Sussex ratepayers. He said that there would probably be shared use with the community for the first time.

The new facilities would complement Hart House and the Benson building and the old proposal for a single men's athletic building will be scrapped.

However, Evans revealed, there will be no other building in the area other than Innis College before 1980, in light of the provincial building freeze. He said that the university would maintain and improve the properties it owns in the area and that this was reflected in renovations on the north side of Washington Avenue.

He added that any further expansion would involve replacement or renovation of existing buildings.

Levitt rose at the end of the meeting to question Evans about U of T Professor Ian Hector who was fired from his job as a consultant for the Workmen's Compensation Board. The controversial psychiatrist said in one case that Italians "are culturally disposed" to play a sick role.

The council quickly moved in camera and all observers and reporters were forced to leave because the discussion would involve personalities.

However The Varsity was able to learn that Levitt was severely criticized for bringing the issue up and loud voices were heard coming from the Simcoe Hall council chamber.

The council approved the 11 additional members for the Academic Affairs Committee from outside its ranks. The three students are Dave Laughton (Vic IV) Erindale Student council president Peter Smith and Allyn Kelley (SGS).

The six teaching staff include Nursing dean M.K. King, political science professor C.P. Stoicheff, law professor J.B. Dunlop and Slavic language professor K.B. Feuer. The administrative staff representative will be assistant director of extension A.R. Waugh and alumni representative M.A. Barten.

By-elections will be held to replace two students members who resigned from the council. Former SAC vice-president Phil Dak is not continuing as a student and last year's unsuccessful SAC presidential candidate Chuck Vickery also resigned.

188 sale delayed

By BOB BETTESON

Approval of a sale of U of T-owned property at 188 Yonge Street to the Fairview Corporation was delayed last night by the Governing Council.

The property was left to the university in 1922 by Naomi Bilton with the provision that it never be sold to Eaton's. The Fairview Corporation is the developer of the mammoth Eaton centre development planned for the area where the site is located.

Council chairman and carpet magnate C. Malim Harding informed the council that it was "just a normal business transaction". He claimed that Eaton's has no interest in Fairview and that Fairview will carry out the provisions of the will.

Howard Levitt (New III) argued that if the sale went through, the university would be "co-operating in the sprawling development of the city."

Graduate student governor Barry Mitchell said that there are moral considerations involved and accused the university of "thwarting the will of someone who trusted it."

Corporate lawyer John Tory said there would be no breach of the will in the proposed sale. He maintained that the university has an obligation to sell at the best price because the present return is "inadequate." He also pointed out that even if U of T was violating the will, the three charities that would then receive the property have waived their rights.

Crown Trust executive vice-president James Joyce, a member of the Business Affairs Committee, said that previous discussion on the sale was "purely from a business angle." He maintained that the sale was an administrative matter and did not need the council's approval.

Harding refused to disclose the price offered but said that if it was invested in gilt edge bonds that return would be much greater than the present rental fees from Reitman's.

Finally approval was put off because a motion to put it on the agenda failed for lack of a two thirds majority. It will be considered at the next meeting in October. Meanwhile the papers have not been signed for the sale.

The sale had been discussed by the Business Affairs committee five times but was not brought to the full Governing Council until controversy arose over the sale last week.

Don't read!

If you're reading this story, you probably shouldn't be—because it's just another announcement for a Varsity staff meeting to be held today at 1 pm at 51 St. George. It's a well-known fact that Varsity staffers do not read The Varsity, so readers of this story might as well stop now, since they have no use for the staff meeting.

But, on the other hand, if you've read this far you must be interested in working on the paper. In that case, why don't you drop up to the Varsity offices? We particularly need people interested in layout and news. If you come for the staff meeting, you will see direct democracy in action, as the "general will" of Varsity staffers is determined on the great issues of the day—like editorial "policy", a representative for the Varsity Board of Directors, and cetera.

This story could quite easily have ended at the above paragraph, but, as you may have guessed already, it's supposed to fill a certain amount of space. That's why this paragraph was added on. Obviously, if students from various colleges and faculties could come in and provide us with news or news ideas, we wouldn't have to fill up space in sneaky ways like this. Now that you've read all the way through this, do you wonder why?

Parity is issue in SAC referendum

By BOB BETTSON

The Students' Administrative Council voted on Wednesday to ask students in an October referendum whether they favor student-non-student parity on hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure bodies, defeating president Bob Anderson's motion to only ask whether they favoured staff-student parity.

Other questions that will be posed will be whether students support SAC membership in the new National Union of Students and whether they favour a student majority on a joint men's and women's athletic directorate.

Services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch said that the referendum must be explicit in asking whether students support equal student-non-student representation on the committees.

In the past SAC has pushed for staff-student parity which would allow for administrators, alumni and other groups to combine with faculty for a non-student majority.

Anderson explained that he doubted that student-non-student parity would get as much support. The referendum is a key part of a SAC campaign to gain student representation on staffing committees.

The council also decided by a narrow margin to demand six students be added to gain student-non-student parity on a Governing Council committee being set up to review the 1971 U of T Act.

Again the action came despite an earlier Anderson motion to add only two students to gain staff-student parity on the committee.

Mike Edwards (Innis IV) said that anything less than 50 per cent student representation was tantamount to having no students.

Anderson argued that SAC "can't seriously demand 50 per cent student representation". He termed the position "arrogant" and said that it might lose the support of some government appointees who are sympathetic to student representation.

Kanowitch replied that Anderson was "mistaking arrogance for the struggle for the important principle of student control of the university".

The review of the U of T Act was a concession given to students by the Conservative government in 1971 when they were refused parity after pressure from the U of T Faculty Association reversed an earlier scheme which allowed equal staff-student representation on the Governing Council.

Approval of the SAC response to the Forster Task Force Report on Academic Appointments was delayed for two weeks after several SAC reps asked for time to discuss the issue in their constituencies and get student response.

A grant of $200 was made to the newly formed Association of Chilean

Students to finance a campaign to put pressure on the Canadian government not to recognize the junta which seized power in Chile last week.

Support was also given to the Women's Abortion Coalition, who are planning a demonstration Saturday to protest the prosecution of Henry Morgentaler, a Montreal physician, for performing illegal abortions. The $200 grant was passed by a large margin.

Seven California farmworkers came to the meeting to gain support for a second boycott of non-union grapes and lettuce. SAC gave $750 to a campus support committee and agreed to request the U of T administration to get campus food outlets to stop serving the grapes, lettuce, and Kraft and Dare products, also the target of boycott campaigns.

The council voted to oppose the sale of university property at 188 Yonge Street to the Fairview Corporation. The building, on the site of the mammoth Eaton-Fairview development, was left to the university in 1922 by Naomi Bilton who stipulated that it was not to be sold to Eaton's.

Notice was given that the Black Students' Union will apply for a grant of $5700 at the next council meeting to finance its activities. The last time the BSU applied for a SAC grant in 1970 there was a controversy over a request for $20,000. After a bitter confrontation a $5,000 grant passed. The next year more stringent controls on grants to campus and outside groups were adopted at a SAC constitutional conference. This was in response to protests from professional faculties about money spent financing political activities.

The council also agreed to support the organizing effort of the Graduate Assistants Union and oppose the 10 per cent interest charge announced by the Conservative government on a new loan scheme for part time students.

Pay isn't issue at Artistic

By DAVID LIPTON

The issue of whether immigrant workers have the same rights as native Canadians was the central topic at the Artistic Woodwork Strike Conference on Wednesday night. The general feeling among the 200 people attending the conference was that so far immigrant workers do not those rights.

The conference, held at OISE, was in support of the fight of the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union (CTCU) against arbitrary management rule. Most of the 120 striking employees at Artistic are immigrant workers.

The CTCU struck at the Artistic Woodwork Company on August 21 after negotiations broke down over a management-labour relations clause in the contract. But since then, Metro police have been escorting non-union workers across the picket lines, and there have been at least 24 picketers arrested at the plant, near Keele and Lawrence.

At Wednesday's meeting it became clear that this strike involved far more than a dispute over management-labour relations. The central issue was whether a double standard would prevail in Canada. Are newly arrived immigrants, represented by unions such as the CTCU, entitled to the same rights as native Canadian workers or not? Both the strikers and their supporters felt that so far the answer to this question was no.

CTCU secretary-treasurer Madeleine Parent was the first speaker at the meeting. Workers rights, Parent declared, not money, was the main issue of this strike. Her speech was an indictment of a management that wants to use immigrants as a source of cheap, underprivileged labour and a police force that seemed intent on treating immigrants as second class citizens.

Several members of Toronto City Council attended the conference to express their concern about the course of the strike. Alderman Dan Heap, who chaired the meeting, stressed the need for unified, broad based support of the union's cause.

Aldermen John Sewell and Archie Chisolm were also at the meeting to give their support to the CTCU. All three demanded that the police act more impartially.

While on the picket line Sewell said he felt that police were actively supporting management. Union picketers corroborated Sewell's statement with vivid accounts of their own strike experiences. Most of the stories focused on the police's overly forceful behaviour in clearing the way for scabs entering the factory.

City councilmen were particularly disturbed by the behaviour of higher police officials. When the council asked for a meeting with the police commission, their request was turned down. In view of these circumstances Sewell felt that the police were acting as "a law unto themselves".

Mel Watkins of the Ontario Waffle stressed the issue of political and civil rights. Watkins confessed that as a Canadian he "was not very happy" to see the present course of events.

"I wondered about the rights that workers were supposed to have in this country," he said.

Artistic Woodwork's management is attempting to deprive workers of their basic rights by refusing to negotiate on worker security. In an ultimatum, the company granted a substantial wage increase of 65 cents an hour, but only if the union accepted a controversial clause in the contract, which would allow management the final authority to discharge any worker violating company rules.

Since the union was to have no voice in the formulation of rules, and the worker would have no appeal against management's verdict, acceptance of the contract would effectively nullify all workers' rights.

As a consequence of management's refusal to negotiate, the union has charged the company with bargaining in bad faith, and the charge will be heard by the Ontario Labour Relations Board next week.

Many people in the union, as well as their supporters, thought the police and the company acted as they did because the CTCU was a small union composed mostly of recent immigrants.

At the meeting one speaker noted that bigger, more established unions with native born Canadian workers were not usually confronted with such outrageous company demands or pushed around with impunity by the police.

Support for the CTCU came from many quarters. R. Conner, provincial treasurer of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers Federation brought the support of his 34,000 member association. Andreas Papandreu of the Pan-Hellenic Liberation Movement, Angelo Principe of the Italian Democratic Association, Archie Wilson from the United Auto Workers and Al Reese of the United Electrical Workers also aligned themselves and their organizations with the CTCU's struggle.

Artists and art dealers were present as well to voice their solidarity with the union's cause. Joyce Wieland representing a group of Canadian artists and Aaron Isaacs of the Isaacs Gallery said they and their colleagues would not purchase Artistic Woodwork's products until the strike was over.

The conference ended with the unanimous adoption of two resolutions demanding equal rights for all Canadian workers.

Cheap slop at Scarborough?

By PAT ELLIS

Perhaps you've heard the word that food can be bought for a pittance at the Scarborough Campus. Such talk had been spreading like a prairie fire across the St. George territories. Through all this we have kept our ears close to the ground and in so doing have unearthed the following information for you, the grass roots.

Ross Flowers, one of SAC's vice-presidents last year, and the folks on the Scarborough student council have pressed the college to drop food prices in its cafeteria by the college's complex accounting system rather than through the caterers themselves, so students will still find turkey in their sandwiches.

In fact the college may still be profiting off its restaurant alleges Paul Carson, a student council administrator. He feels that since the college acquiesced to council demands for a price drop with so little battle the caf may indeed still be profiting.

Accordingly the council is carrying on with a campaign to lower the food prices even more.

On the St. George campus we talked with Seymour Kanowitch, the SAC Services Commissioner. He claimed that other university councils drag our school's grub through the dirt and that U of T's food is probably the worst in Upper Canada.

Accordingly, SAC is trying to set up a food board with a majority of students. This board's purpose would be to improve the quality of the food at St. George trucks by dealing directly with the caterers. It is doubted by Kanowitch that Simcoe Hall will go for this board.

So St. George students can expect to spend an anemic winter unlike their robust brothers and sisters in Scarborough because of the bureaucratic whimsy of Simcoe Hall.

The Varsity, a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Carson Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Food Sci decision must come now

The Governing Council has once again sent the thorny problem of "food sciences" off to a review committee. We say once again, because the faculty has been under review for the past 18 months. Sometime soon a decision should be made for the sake of the faculty, students, and teaching staff.

The administration of this university is not helping the situation by causing a state of uncertainty about the continued existence of the faculty. If things had gone its way in the past, people such as vice-president of Health Sciences J.D. Hamilton would have seen the faculty of food sciences eliminated on the basis of uncertainty of a continued existence. But now the debate continues and is due to surface at the next meeting of the Governing Council's Planning and Resources Committee.

The idea of phasing out food sciences came in January, 1971, with an announcement by Hamilton, although he did grant a three year phase-out grace period. The administration's reasons were: insufficient demand by students, the high cost to educate each student, and the availability of similar courses elsewhere. Minor inconveniences also stood in the way (again according to the administration): existing labs would have to be renovated, and more courses would have to be introduced to meet new Faculty of Education requirements for admission to studies leading to a type "A" teaching certificate.

The university also pointed out that credit couldn't be given for the department's courses in nutrition, textiles, and food chemistry by the Canadian Institute of Food Technology.

However students and faculty members fought back. The following year enrolment jumped from 93 to 150, and it was pointed out that the average students-teacher ratio in the faculty was five to one, while the university ratio was 10 or 11 to one. So did it really cost more to educate each student?

Even though credit wouldn't be given by the Canadian Institute of Food Technology in certain department courses or areas, the faculty calendar lists awards from various organizations including the Canadian Dietetic Association Award, the Carnation Company Incentive Award (administered by the Canadian Home Economics Association), the Borden Company, Limited, Award, the Chemica Institute of Canada Prize in Food Chemistry, and the Society of Chemical Industry (Canadian Section) Merit Award in Food Chemistry. (The list goes on.) So much for the inference of a lack of quality in the faculty.

The Executive Committee of the old Senate decided at its last meeting in 1972 to establish a committee to investigate the role of the faculty in the university and the province. Submitted in May, 1972, the Fisher Committee report called for "a new emphasis in the program of the faculty which will enhance its academic credibility and at the same time generate increased revenue for the University of Toronto and the Faculty." In general, the report went on to recommend a stronger faculty.

But problems arose with the implementation committee set up last fall under the chairmanship of associate arts dean Jim Cruise. Having failed to eliminate the faculty or at least certain sections of it, the implementation committee sought to do the job. And the 10 member committee only contained four food science representatives.

It is the implementation committee's recommendations that the Governing Council is now debating. The committee was set up to examine the feasibility of the report's recommendations and the mechanisms required to carry them out. But it seems that the process has gone one stage further — back again to the Governing Council.

There has been considerable discussion and ample time for decision. We have heard talk of J.D. Hamilton's plans for empire building in the health sciences and his desire to eliminate home economics (now called "bionomics") and then amalgamate the rest of the Faculty of Food Sciences with Health Sciences. And we are also familiar with president John Evans' desire to set priorities and eliminate what he considers to be the deadwood of the university.

But we think Food Sciences should stay, and point to the Fisher report as reason why.

However we also feel that there has been enough deliberation. The university administration's delaying tactics should stop. A decision should be made within the next month. It's the only responsible way to deal with a situation involving the faculty's status as well as the students and faculty of food sciences's welfare in general.

Mobilize masses against Chile coup

Since the last two editions of The Varsity both contained attacks on the Communist Party (in the name of left unity) we felt we should make our position clear.

The workers, peasants and intellectuals of Chile are today faced with a situation of civil war against a fascist military junta. Here in Canada we are faced with the task of building a movement which can concretely aid the Chilean people in their struggle. On the basis of the experience of the Second World War, the Communist Party believes that the struggle against fascism is not the task of socialists, alone but of broad masses of the Canadian people who oppose fascism. The Communist Party is therefore in support of all actions which serve to unite as many Canadians as possible in support of the Chilean people by, for example, demanding that the Canadian government refuse recognition to the military junta.

The duty of Communists, as revolutionaries and internationalists, is to support those demands and activities which unite antifascist, democratic Canadians in providing all possible aid to the Chilean struggle. The Communist Party therefore opposes actions and slogans which suggest that support for Chilean workers, peasants and intellectuals is the responsibility of revolutionaries, or even of socialists, alone. We consider as sectarian all actions which isolate those supporting Chile from the potentially very broad-based support.

In building a united movement of solidarity with Chile, Communists believe we must begin with the specific historical situation of Canada as it is today and not as we wish it were. The tendency of certain leftist groups to put forward symbols and slogans appropriate to a different, more revolutionary, level of struggle can only lead to sectarian mistakes. Examples of this sort of sectarianism in Toronto last week were the rather indiscriminate flying of the Red Flag at marches and the slogan of one leftist group, "Arm the workers, smash the coup." While these actions no doubt made a small group of student leftists feel more revolutionary, they are meaningless to the vast majority of Canadians and serve only to isolate the movement supporting the struggle of the Chilean people.

At the present time, members of the Communist Party are working within their unions, community groups and other democratic organizations to build support for solidarity with the struggle of the Chilean people. Members of the Party are also supporting actions called by the Canadian Peace Congress, an organization which played a leading role in the fight against the Cold War and in support of the struggle of the Indo-Chinese people against American imperialism. Contrary to a statement in a letter in Monday's Varsity the Communist Party at this moment is not a member of any coalition around Chile.

The U of T Communist Club believes that the majority of students at this university oppose the fascist coup in Chile and must be encouraged to make their opposition known. We believe that the most effective approach to building support for the Chilean people on campus is for students and faculty to become involved as individuals in a broad, non-sectarian committee. We call on all students to sign any of the various petitions on Chile that are circulating, to send letters to MP's and daily newspapers calling on the government to refuse diplomatic recognition to the junta, to attend meetings to learn about the situation in Chile and to participate in demonstrations of protest and solidarity.

Criticizes critic of criticism

Tom Walkom prefaces an article on an artist drop-in centre by an irrelevant attack on the "journalism" of music criticism. I don't see the connection he makes between alleged pretentiousness of music criticism and the popular reputation of classical music for pretentiousness. Would a less pretentious style of criticism endear him more to classical music?

And what of those examples of "pretentious" music criticism which, he says, mean nothing to "lesser mortals"? Well, for a moment let's take a "lesser mortal" who knows rock and as he knows thirteenth-century Flemish polyphony, i.e. not at all. Have him read this from a review by Tom Walkom from last year's Varsity: "Lighthouse has a new album out, called Sunny Days. There's nothing wrong with the album — Lighthouse is a proficient group, good vocals, good instrumentation. It's sort of a let's-sit-in-the-back-yard-where-the-neighbours-can't-see-us-and-smoke-dope-kind of record... Listening to it, I got the impression of late 50's lyrics within the more complex musical structure of the late 60's." "Album"? "Vocals"? That long hyphenated part? "late fifties lyrics"? "more complex musical structure"? This lesser mortal is lost, as is anyone who reads even moderately detailed reviews on subjects he couldn't be paid to learn about. How did Walkom fall into the trap of using the Varsity of which he is an editor to publicize his own prejudices?

Handbook not a propaganda sheet

I would like to take this opportunity to answer, on behalf of the Editorial Collective of Everyone's A Winner at the U of T, a letter from R.B. Spinner which was published in Wednesday's paper. I am happy Mr. Spinner took the time and trouble to submit his thoughts and I hope that other critics of our journalistic opus will do the same.

In the first place, we never thinly disguised the fact that the epic was "poorly written, dull and sloppily put together". Our immense staff tried our best to fulfill those criteria, but most readers have thought us unsuccessful in doing so. The "wit" which Mr. Spinner described as "Junior High School level", may not have even reached that plateau, but he may find most humor at this university goes back to kindergarten days.

As for his accusation of the book being a "Young Socialist propaganda sheet", the members of the collective never agreed on anything, let alone a political ideology. Although one of our members belongs to the YS, it does not mean the book was put out by that group. Another collective member belongs to B'nai B'rith, but that does not mean the booklet is a Zionist propaganda sheet.

In closing, Everyone's a Winner, I feel, did not stress one line, but offered the new student a number of alternative groups and clubs to participate in. We only exposed the raw materials that this university offers and suggested the student use them to her or his best advantage.

Innis belongs to the Innisese

We, the students of the Innis College Student Society (ICSS), wish to lodge a formal complaint regarding (1) the University-wide invitation to our Street Dance and Banquet on Friday, September 14 which we feel was in poor taste, and (2) your closing remarks in your article of Wednesday, September 19.

You must realize that the Innis College building has been on the shelf for four years, and the mere mention of a new building was taken as idle rumor. Therefore, this festivity, a major part of our Orientation for first-year students, was an opportunity for our Alumni and the College Community to finally see a concrete proposal for our new building. This encompasses about 800 people, and due to our small size, this is the optimum number we could realistically support through our Student Society.

In regard to our elitism, one question was foremost in our minds—that of satisfying the Innis College Community, which we did. Secondly, the barriers were not put up to bar non-Innis students from entering the area, their main purpose was to allow us to serve liquor in an open area. In fact, we could not obtain an outdoor liquor permit without a limited guest list. We did open the celebration to all University students after 7 pm as can be attested by many students outside of Innis.

We would like to reiterate that the Varsity did not contact any member of the ICSS Executive before publishing the invitation, which potentially could have destroyed the entire festivity. Your remark regarding the free dance and barbeque attracted the majority of people "interested," very few non-Innisites were interested in the sod-turning.

Therefore, the ICSS strongly condemns the Varsity, a University-wide paper, for deliberately trying to undermine a college-oriented festivity, and we hope you take more time to investigate the facts behind such occasions in future.

Part-time study statements 'fiction'

Myth and reality, fiction and fact — difficult to separate if your sense of integrity fails to embrace a search for the truth.

In The Varsity of Wednesday, 12 September, 1973, Mrs. Norma Grindal, a member of the Governing Council, and elected by part-time students, is quoted directly and indirectly on the topics of instruction, quality of faculty, equality of the degree, and other matters relative to the academic programme of students of this University who are proceeding to a degree through part-time study.

It is necessary on occasion to break the mould in which myth is created, because myths can assume dangerous proportions. Before the mould from which Mrs. Grindal's myth was extracted is used again, Let's Break It! There is no relationship between the fiction expressed by Mrs. Grindal and the facts. This has been said many times. It needs to be said again to protect the value of the degree earned by more than five thousand graduates of this Division and to reassure the fifteen thousand part-time students at present registered for courses that there is not a double standard for degrees at the University of Toronto.

Fraternities show their colors

This is merely a letter to commend the courage and intelligence of a hereto unnamed group of fraternity men from the University of Toronto who, fighting for the right, attacked a vicious group of women at the York University U of T football game at CNE Stadium on Saturday, September 15.

These 40 odd men have convinced me that all my suspicions (well founded) about U of T are true. They have also confirmed my opinion (very low) of fraternities and their place in the university community. With age comes tradition, York has neither of these but neither does it (thank god) have the abuse which often confuses tradition with violence. The exhibition of stupidity and bravado by these boys reflects poorly, or so it would seem to me, on a university with the prestige of the University of Toronto.

I don't imagine that what happened to me at that football game has been experienced by very many people. It was one of the most terrifying moments of my entire life: to watch 40 boys slowly move in as a lion would to the kill. What was the reason for all this... an air-raid siren! This is approximately equal to someone breaking through to the headquarters of Lady Godiva and stealing all their mouthpieces. (now why didn't I think of that before.)

If this was some kind of initiation prank it failed miserably.

In closing, I would like to apologize to any of the Forty Thieves who were injured fighting the seven, brave defenders of the siren

Fired, then rehired

By MARINA STRAUSS

After firing Barbara Massey last August on what she charged were "grounds of sex", the university yesterday rehired her for another job.

Massey, who was operator in the Faculty of Education duplicating room in August, filed a complaint to the Ontario Human Rights Commission claiming the Faculty dean's administrative assistant, G. Mitchell, dismissed her with the sole explanation that "it's more of a man's job".

Mitchell told the Commission's investigation hearing yesterday that he didn't mean his remark to be discriminatory, but that he was just protecting Massey's feelings. He said he regretted having said it.

The Commission's officer N. Mawande closed the case after Placement Centre employment services manager Kemp Jackson offered to find Massey another similar job.

Although not in a position to make a judgment on the case, Mawande admitted in an interview, "I think she was entitled to some explanation as why she was fired".

He said Mitchell "wanted to let her down gently," but, he conceded, "I think it was a misjudgment."

"It is quite common for employees to be fired for stupid reasons," Mawande said.

"We get many complaints from people who were never told the real facts."

"It is quite common in industry for somebody to be terminated because of changes or reorganization in a company," he continued.

"An employer rarely comes out and says you're a lousy employee. It's not nice to tell people they're lousy."

Mitchell told the investigation he had received complaints from the registrar's secretary about the quality of Massey's work. In addition, requests were not properly carried out, he said.

Jarvis residents move against rent hikes.

By MICHAEL BYRNE
Apartment residents in the Wellesley-Jarvis St. area have formed a committee to investigate unreasonable rent increases in the area.

The decision was made at a meeting of area residents held Tuesday evening at Jarvis Collegiate. The meeting was called as a result of the recent rent hikes and eviction notices occurring at 5 Earl Street.

Joe Valevicius, owner of the apartment gave eviction notices to all of his tenants August 31. Recently Valevicius extended the eviction date to the middle of October.

Valevicius, however, has remained firm on the rent increase. Rent for a bachelor apartment at 5 Earl Street will go from $130 per month to $180, an increase of 40 per cent.

Tenants reported that the rent increases are supposed to pay for renovations but when Valevicius was questioned about his plans for renovating he admitted that he didn't know and said that in some apartments there would be no renovations at all.

The tenants at 5 Earl Street, whom Valevicius has referred to as "unemployed perverts", have stated that they have spent their own funds in keeping the building in repair.

An apartment on 3 Meredith Crescent is another property owned by Valevicius. In this case rent has been increased over 78 per cent. These tenants were also told the increases were to pay for major renovations but, according to tenants, the renovations have been minor — like painting, wall papering and carpeting.

In Wednesday's Globe and Mail it was revealed that Valevicius who owns these properties, lost his real estate broker's licence for placing $101,325 of trust accounts into his firm's general account.

Valevicius, who is attempting to regain his licence told a Commercial Registration Appeal Tribunal that he had since "rehabilitated himself and was working to enhance his reputation in the real estate industry."

Valevicius, who is 31 years of age, attempted to grab the reporter's notebook following the hearing, for fear of the publicity.

Course lectures open to public

By TINA SREBOTNJAK
"Women unite!" is the slogan announcing a series of 22 lectures given by the department of Interdisciplinary Studies as part of its INX 260 course, Women, Oppression and Liberation.

The lectures which are open to the general public, take place every Wednesday at 7 p.m. at the Faculty of Education, 371 Bloor Street at Spadina.

Although structured essentially after last year's program in Women's Studies, the novelty of the course is that its lectures, part of a full credit course in the university curriculum, are free.

A recent press release states that the change was made to avoid the intellectual elitism and social isolation of the typical university class.

"In a way, it is too easy to become just another experimental trip within the safe and coddled environment of the university. We want to be more community-spirited and radical than that."

The staff of INX 260 is a collective, made up of both academic and non-university women. The instructors, several of whom are graduate students, have specific interest areas in which they are particularly qualified to lecture.

INX 260, while dealing with woman as a universal being, gives particular emphasis to the Canadian Women's Movement.

The lecture topics are diverse, embracing many familiar themes and several new ones. Woman is considered not only in terms of her sexuality, her "role" in the family, her importance and strength in professional fields, and her fight for liberation. Other topics, such as women in sports, and women under socialism, suggest new ways of viewing the subject.

Each lecture is to be hosted either by a guest speaker or by a member of the 10-woman staff responsible for INX 260. Discussion will follow each lecture or film, in the hope that those present will exchange ideas with others they would not ordinarily come into contact with.

turns records into gold*

(turn the page)

Guess what makes records go round (and it ain't electricity)

By DAVID BASSKIN

This summer, the music industry was shaken to its roots when it was announced that Clive Davis, president of Columbia Records, had been fired for the alleged mismanagement of company funds.

In more precise terms, this was the biggest payola scandal in the industry's history. Not only was Davis involved at Columbia, but dozens of other record companies were fingered by US Federal agents. Now, the matter awaits senate investigation and criminal proceedings.

The Davis affair shouldn't be treated simply as an interesting example of graft. It lifts the lid from an industry that deserves scrutiny from anyone who buys records.

Clive Davis was more than an upper executive at Columbia, the music arm of CBS, one of the most powerful communication networks in the world. He was symbolic of the change that had come over the music industry over the past decade, and it's symbolic that he was the first one to get a public whipping.

At one time, record companies were controlled by musicians, producers, or others closely connected with the performing end of the business. Promotion and advertising were usually handled by the same men and women who put the records together. However, when it became more and more obvious in the early sixties that youth had a huge amount of money to spend on records, small companies were bought up by the score, and the big outfits started to expand in all directions.

Before this boom, Columbia was one of the bigger companies, with a well balanced line of jazz, classical, pop and rock. Rock, in particular, was a sideline which occupied only about 15 per cent of the company's catalogue. Columbia had most of the best jazz artists of the era, and held exclusive contracts on such stars as Leonard Bernstein and Eugene Ormandy in the classical field.

Came the boom and Clive Davis gradually changed the makeup of the label to 50 per cent rock, with a heavy emphasis on speculation. Dozens of groups recorded demos, singles and albums for Columbia; only a few made it to large public acceptance.

During this period, folk music went from a specialist's hobby to a national craze. Then, with the arrival of the "British sound", American labels outdid each other in signing anything with long hair and a guitar that could be found in England. By now, the pattern was set. Groups of highly questionable talent were being packaged like meat, advertised by means both legitimate and subliminal, and finally dumped when the public had tired of them. It was a highly successful pattern to follow, one that is still with us today.

One way of advertising a record that was too useful for the record moguls to ignore was their old friend payola, or payoffs to disc jockeys. The late fifties had seen the great payola scandals, and as a result of the nationally televised senate hearings (where even Dick Clark of American Bandstand was grilled). Disc jockeys saw an end to their tax-free promotion money. As a matter of fact, dozens of them saw the end of their careers, and were tossed out of the stations into jail. To remedy the situation, radio stations created a new executive position — the playlist man. Now the disc jockeys would have no control over the records to be played, and thus could not be accused of taking bribes. The playlist would contain a highly select group of 45's, usually no more than 25, and these would receive continuous exposure on the air for the period that the list was in effect.

The real outcome of this move was to change the person who would get the payola. For the companies, having only one playlist manager to take care of proved less work than a lot of disc jockeys. When a push was needed by a record company, payola did the trick quite nicely.

Now, Davis is out, and the whole industry is awaiting the Federal Government's decision on the matter. Probably there will be another inquiry by the Senate, and heads will roll again. Some cynics predict that this cleanup will last even less time than the last one, but that's to be seen.

But payola isn't the only way to influence record tastes — it's just the most blatant.

Radio is still the most powerful forum for a new group. Not only can a single boost album sales, but 45's, themselves pull in a lot of money.

An old institution on Toronto is the CHUM Chart, put out by that radio station. How is it made up? This is an important question, because the charts are crucial in the world of records. The most important chart in the industry is the Billboard Hot 100, which is like the CHUM Chart, except that it is compiled from nationwide sources, and has 200 singles rather than 30.

Wherever the charts are made up, they have to go to sources for information on what records are selling. The sources are record manufacturers, dealers, reviewers, radio stations, and (occasionally) buyers. The stores are the major source of information, but are they an accurate source?

An increasing trend in recent years is the ownership of a record outlet by a record company. In Toronto, Columbia owns A&A, Capitol owns Sherman's — two of the city's biggest. There's nothing intrinsically wrong with this kind of ownership. But when the chart men come around, there is considerable temptation for executives to list as top sellers records that just happen to be pressed by the parent company whether or not they're chart-toppers. In short, the record charts are not accurate indicators of public taste, but rather the generated reports of the music business.

though. Albums have their own charts, and since an album sells for much more than a single, there's a lot more money to be made. Billboard, the leading industry paper, has a vitally important album chart, where 200 top sellers are listed. It too is gleaned from the industry-controlled large retailers.

That's not to say that all record stores are controlled by the disc-cutters. Independents, although their number shrinks every week, still make up a large segment of the market. But they too depend on the record charts, because stocking large quantities of a record that nobody wants can be financially disastrous. If the chart says that a certain disc is number one, the usually financially hard-pressed independent will not take a chance; he'll order up lots of the top item.

A relatively new phenomenon has appeared in the business — the rack jobber. Your corner Becker's or Mac's isn't a place you'd usually think of as a record shop, yet if you look at them, you'll probably find a record rack with a selection of pop albums. Drug stores, gas stations, and other retail outlets not usually associated with records seem to

Movies move in on Stratford

The aura generated by an entire theatre of film fanatics is an almost tangible thing at the Stratford Film Festival. At the festival's opening last week-end, each dimming of the lights brought an expectant hush from the audience, sustaining the excitement of a chance to do nothing but see films, talk about films, think and write about films.

The ninth International Film Festival at Stratford is already proving itself an important cultural and artistic event. Someday it may be able to generate an enthusiasm not only for the international films which it justifiably promotes, but also for the much neglected and under-rated Canadian film industry.

The pre-Festival showings, William Sterling's Alice In Wonderland (1972) and Douglas Fairbanks' The Black Pirate (1926), eased us into the celluloid clutch of the magic screen. The official emersion began with the North American premiere presentation of Joseph Losey's A Doll's House.

William Sterling's new musical adaptation of Alice's Adventures In Wonderland is a lightweight, though star-packed, approach to this classic fantasy. Peter Sellers, Spike Milligan, Ralph Richardson, Flora Robson to name a few, have fun with their cameo roles but can't keep the film from being slow moving and unmagically contrived. The colourful and varied sets of Wonderland retain a picture-book flatness and artificial plasticity which are enlivened very little by the cardboard performances of its inhabitants.

Alice, played by Fiona Fullerton, comes across as a rather obnoxious partaker in magic, getting on everybody's nerves including the audience. All in all it would have been better had she stayed where she belonged — wearing a clean white pinafore in her narrow little British Victorian world.

Douglas Fairbanks' The Black Pirate, starring himself as the dashing adventurer, and Billie Dove, as the helpless princess, is much more fantastic and infinitely entertaining as well. This was his first feature film to be made entirely in technicolor, but the early processing gives such beautifully muted tones that the colour clarity of present film seems almost garish in comparison.

Pirate incorporates a timeless formula of a thrilling, fast-paced plot, villainy overcome, an undefeatable hero and a romantic happy ending. Filled with spectacle and daring stunts, the film asserts itself as a gaily escapist antidote to reality and succeeds splendidly.

The explicitly controlled production of A Doll's House is an interesting study in contrasts to the preceding film. Being a much more complex rendition of reality, and of one woman's reality in particular, it is also more problematic. And because that woman is played by the militantly modern Jane Fonda, a forced suspension of disbelief is required to relate to her in Ibsen's 1879 setting.

That is perhaps why Losey spends some time filming her moving about in her environment rather than talking. But there are still moments when one expects her to turn to the camera and say what she really thinks about this little squirrel of a wife, munching forbidden macaroons behind her husband's back and conforming to the priorities of his position.

Losey loosens up the play's tightly structured meshwork of revelations about the past confounding characters of the present, by using the opening sequences of the film to actually show the past events. The relationship between the hard-pressed Christine and Krogstad, the would-be blackmailer of Nora and her husband, Torvald, is more developed and therefore more meaningful than in the play. It also becomes an ironic counterpart to the growing estrangement between Nora and Torvald.

Losey's device of taking Nora outside into the cool, white Norwegian winter lightens the claustrophobic atmosphere of her house emphasized in the play. But even so the boundaries of her world are explicitly defined. She goes no further than the children's toboggan run and is often shown going up or down the same main street before hastening back to her doll's house. The long street shots only underline the short distance involved.

Jane Fonda as Nora underplays the potential histrionics of her role giving us a controlled and distant woman whom we never really come to know. The desperate but light-footed flamboyance necessary for the Tarantella dance is heavily done, but her quiet, even reasonable exit from Torvald gives a dignity to that scene — the key to the whole film. Trevor Howard as Dr. Rank, David Warner as the husband and especially Delphine Seyrig as Nora's friend Christine give strong interesting performances, defined balanced and somehow locked in place by the pull stress and hold of Losey's meticulous, camera sense.

The grand finale of the weekend was Marcel Ophüls' brilliant exploration of the current situation in Northern Ireland, A Sense of Loss. Refining and crystallizing the style used in his film about wartime France, The Sorrow and the Pity, Ophüls terms this work a film report.

His documentary realism is as powerful as the fictionalization of the form achieved in Pontecorvo's Battle of Algiers. Ophüls can evoke from a simple interview the essence of human tragedy. He uses an effective cross-cutting of newsreel footage, filmed street shots, dual viewpoint interviews and the personal comments of the people involved to demonstrate the tensions and complexities of the Irish (and English) dilemma. So selective and yet fluid is his camera and sound recorder that the bias of his observation is hazed by a wider viewpoint, infiltrating from sources seemingly outside himself. In the end it is the common humanity and inhumanity of these people, for and against each other, that asserts the dominant voice.

The Stratford Film Festival ends tomorrow with James Bridges' The Paper Chase which was shot mostly in and around the University of Toronto.

The Story So Far,
Matt Cohen, editor
Coach House Press, $3.00

So far so what!

Matt Cohen, the editor of this anthology of Canadian short stories, an annual making its second appearance, claims that the short story has been "sprung loose" from reflecting in its form its origins in an age of rationalism and logical thought.

No longer does the short story have to end happily or tragically. With the rational order collapsed the moral order that supported such a need.

Now the short story is free to be "more approximate to whatever realities the writers perceive."

Now "language menaders and makes its own senseless associations."

Forewarned is forarmed.

A story by Barry Charles, entitled 'Egotizm', is included.

"He woke to find his mother a grey haired woman sitting above his bed, her angry black shoe pointing in the air."

"He: How are ya son?"

"He: All right ma, they're going to kill me you know."

"She: What yuh do, kid?"

"He: I don't know."

"She: Well when yuh know find out. (in exasperation)"

"He: So I can die for something?"

"She (with power): Right on!"

"He (with great question) And a southern accent, Bless my soul?"

"She: Blow your soul..."

Egotizm, schegotizm; bloody egoism.

Margaret Atwood contributes one story, 'Encounters with the Element Man'.

Yawn.

But 'Stolen Moments' — by Vic d'Or and David Young — a disjointed yet intriguing account of the sexual fantasies of a group of male prisoners — must be excepted.

Saeko Usukaw's whimsical 'One of a Series' ("why don't them blasted things stay still so I kin count em, said annie" etc.) is — I don't know kinda whimsical if ya know what I mean.

And given the unredeemed garrulity of a number of the stories, David Berry's "From the Taoist Parables" wins our appreciation.

This parable is entitled "Concession."

"The trousers fit too tightly at the crotch," complained Wen Po.

"I cannot ruin a work of art," replied the tailor.

"We shall have to remove your testicles."

"Couldn't we just take them in?"

Self-pity betrays honesty

I am watching
by Shirley Gibson,
Anansi; $2.95

In the waning years of the eighteenth century, Goethe wrote The Sorrows of Young Werther, a short tragic novel of a young man suffering from unrequited love and the sense of the utter futility of life. The story of Werther's anguish and his ultimate suicide deeply affected the youth of Germany: Weltschmerz became a national phenomena; many young people actually took their own lives.

Though the romantic movement as it existed then is dead, much of its essence has persisted. Existentialism, preoccupation with alienation, drugs—all are responses to a society incapable of meeting basic human needs. With penetrating descriptions of mutilation such as those by R.D. Laing, radical rejection of present realities includes not only institutional and class oppression, but the deepest and most personal aspects of everyday life.

Shirley Gibson's I am watching is within the tradition: stark depiction of the raw wounds of love. As honest as it is sensitive, it is testimony to both pitiless hurting and sometime ecstasy.

Ultimately, though, it fails. The pain becomes self-pity, the incidents wearisome. A woman in her forties should be beyond adolescent wallowing.

suddenly I know that I have seen it all that there is nothing more to see that I must close my eyes and sleep Falling indefinitely, but definitely short of vivid perception or poignant freshness, the pages become two-dimensional. For real suffering, there must be the possibility of joy. To be wounded in bed, you have to be able to enjoy love-making. Gibson doesn't give the impression she's playing for keeps; she seems to be willing to accept hurt, but not to fiercely want warmth.

Goethe's The Sorrows of Young Werther drove young people to suicide. In the eighteenth century. They've tried to close down Rochdale for less—but fortunately Tony O'Donohue has never heard of Goethe.

"Greatest Hits" hit the pocket

"Handel's Greatest Hits"
"Puccini's Greatest Hits"
London, $6.29 each

Records like these infuriate me. What can you say about the eight or ten greatest works of a given composer, reissued as a "Greatest Hits" record? The Puccini disc, for example, contains 12 arias from Bohème, Tosca, Madame Butterfly, and others, arguably the most popular operas ever written. A collection like this, culled from London's superb tape vaults, can only be a marvelous one.

Why the infuriation, then? A simple matter of economics. The complete opera recordings that these arias were taken from have been in the catalogue for years, and have sold very well. Why then, should a reissue like this sell for an outrageous $6.29? London is not alone in this. The past few years have seen an avalanche of "Greatest Hits" hit the market, almost all at top dollar. With the excellent budget lines that these record companies run, why must old reissues be sold at new-recording prices?

The answer is probably the same as usual—if the public will go for it at this price, then why not do it? Bah. It leaves a bad taste in my mouth.

The issuing (or reissuing, if you want) of a Handel record of this type makes only a little more sense. The program is a selection of arias from the composer's Oratorios, with one piece of incidental music for a filler. (Arrival of the Queen of Sheba from "Solomon"). Not everybody feels inclined to buy complete oratorios, as they are an acquired taste, but for a sampler, this kind of disc ought to be ideal. Again, as it was creamed from the best that "The Royal Family of Opera" (as London grandiosely calls itself) has to offer, the performances are great, particularly Joan Sutherland singing "Let the bright Seraphim" from "Solomon".

But, dammit, why $6.29? A recorded ripoff is what it is. Even though with careful shopping you can buy it for much less, it's simply too much to pay for a reissue. Maybe I'm excessively money-conscious, but it doesn't seem facetious to ask for new recordings when paying new recording prices. Thus endeth today's consumer sermon.

Big bands come back

Woody Herman: Giant Steps
Fantasy

Woody Herman's Herd has a scorching of a new album—Giant Steps (Fantasy). It's the musical climax of his most recent rise to widespread public acclaim.

During the past five or six years big bands have swept from the category of nostalgia (remember the '40s?) to a dramatically growing form of jazz and rock creativity.

Through the bleak fifties and the slightly more encouraging early sixties, Woody Herman's band steadily defied the nostalgia classification and continued to develop. The fifteen chairs in the Herd were consistently filled with enthusiastic, often brilliant young players. In 1968, Woody broke from his old audience which was composed largely of big band fans and made the switch to a more youthful scene with an album called Light My Fire, on the Cadet label.

Six albums and a label change later, comes Giant Steps. The nine cuts on the disc range from the sophisticated, fast-paced jazz of the John Coltrane title tune to Leon Russell's gentle "A Song For You". Probably the most thrilling selection is pianist Chick Corea's driving latin composition "La Fiesta".

The arrangements are gems. Half were written by Bill Stapleton, a trumpet player in the band, and the others were contributed by former Herman associates Tony Klaska, Alan Broadbent and Richard Evans.

A tendency of many big bands is to overdo the impact of twelve horns playing tightly together. There's no such offense on Giant Steps; the norm is lyrical and subtle playing, but when the band does open up—watch out! The rhythm section is a standout—Illston for Andy Laverne on piano, Ed Soph on drums, tenors Frank Tibari, Steve Lederer and Greg Herbert, Stapleton's trumpet and flugelhorn, Jim Pugh on trombone, and of course Woody's clarinet and soprano sax.

Last Tango: why did she wash her dentures?

Near the end of Bernardo Bertolucci's Last Tango in Paris, after your head has plummeted forward a few times, jolting you out of your doze, after you've surreptitiously checked your watch four or five times to see if you've really been sitting there squirming for twenty-five and a half hours the movie starts to get good. Not great, not unusual, just watchable. The good scene begins with Brando and Maria Schneider (the star crossed lovers you know all about from reading Time) in a tango palace, and it lasts until the end of the movie, which sinks once more into lugubriousness. Maybe fifteen minutes, twenty at the outside.

What I am saying is that Last Tango in Paris isn't a very engaging movie. Eroticism itself may be blamed for a lot of things, but it usually isn't boring. So it's difficult to see how Pauline Kael could call this "the most erotic movie ever made". Our reverence for Kael borders on the unhealthy, but her tucks for Tango leave us bewildered. About the only reason to take yourself off to see it, in fact, is to try to figure out why she found it the most impressive movie of her critical career. Explanations are welcome.

Explanations for some other things are welcome, too, from those of you who have two hours and four dollars to burn. Why is the old lady washing her dentures in the public lavatory? What did you mutter when the film cut to the quacking ducks? Do you think the loony black concierge is a refugee from a Hitchcock movie? Did Marlon Brando's overcoat come from Skid Row? Why did the old whore's client change his mind? Did you figure out the chattering maid in the flophouse? Would a man shot by the woman he loves at a moment of emotional chaos think to remove his chewing gum and stick it, malt-shoppe style, on the balcony where he is to die?

All this is exasperating. It's not that they don't fit in anywhere, it's certainly not that they're blemishes on an otherwise brilliant film. It's that Tango is of such pointless excess, such thumping silliness that all you remember are the oddball embellishments. True, there's the tango sequence itself, which is enjoyable in the way the circus scenes were enjoyable in Lola Montes (another disaster, this one by Max Ophüls). True, Brando himself is often compelling, but his improvisations are meaningful, not as part of a work of art, but as data for a movie-mag profile of a charismatic superstar. (I am of the generation and temperament that prefers real writing to ersatz psychodramas, but after some samples of Bertolucci's script, I resigned myself to the ad-libs; even at his most far-flown, Brando is better than his director).

Finally, some questions for more advanced students: why does Maria Schneider roll across the floor every time she has an orgasm? Did Bertolucci pick up his lighting effects from a belle époque brother? Was a chocolate mousse on a hot day the inspiration for Gato Barbieri's saxophone score? What does Francis Bacon have to do with anything? And when is Sunday Bloody Sunday coming back to town?

Abelard an old hero of new opera

Is there a special way, a right way, to listen to a new opera for the first time? With the oldtimers, the Figaros and Gottedammerungs, everything is perfect. The flashy arias and lush orchestral backdrops are all familiar, and you can sit back letting wave after wave of "your" music—yours because you know it

Such an old and obscure story is not the stuff of comic opera.

But even though the odds seem to be against you, the main thing is to enjoy yourself. And as the curtain goes up you are still madly juggling various appropriate critical attitudes, which all fall away as the first note is sounded.

"Heloise and Abelard" turns out to be not such unfamiliar territory after all. The orchestral accompaniment is even a bit too modish, occasionally evoking scarier moments from an episode of "The Outer Limits". The vocal line is a bit Wagnerian, falls into speech now and again, and is comfortably yet disappointingly close to Debussy's revolutionary "Pelleas and Mélisande". We're relieved that the music is approachable but disappointed that it isn't more original.

What Eugene Benson, the librettist, has tried to do, I think, is interweave a conventional operatic love story with a simplified drama of ideas. Abelard the righteous thinker and passionate lover dominates and unifies the opera. Yet the historical Abelard was a wild, impetuous spirit, with a far-ranging intellect unimaginably ahead of its time.

Charles Wilson's Abelard, sung by able Allan Monk, is on the other hand a low-key, lackluster personality. I keep waiting for a "Tristan and Isolde" Liebestod, but it never comes. Strangely, that's the way Wilson seems to want it.

If anyone, Heloise, sung by Heather Thomson, is the dominant musical voice. And Thomson has an amazing depth of tone and emotion to lend her character—she really lived the opera—so that the other main characters including Abelard tend to fall by the side. She reminds me of the single character in a Schoenberg work who pathologically languishes over the corpse of her lover, refusing to believe he is dead. Not nearly so intense or moving, Wilson's drama is titled towards this monody of tragic emotion.

The sets, by Murray Lauffer, of mainly darkness, and the dim lighting, by Ronald Montgomery, so well—wash languorously over you.

But what do you do with a new opera, one such as Charles Wilson's Heloise and Abelard? Along with your old favourites, The Merry Widow and Rigoletto, the Canadian Opera Company tests the O'Keefe Centre's backward acoustics with a complete unknown by a Torontonian. It's based on a story kept alive today only by devotees of Alexander Pope, (who wrote a poem by the same name) and by keen philosophy profs.

Peter Abelard was an important French philosopher from the early middle ages. He was constantly at war with contemporary intellectual lights over his belief that the human mind could solve most intellectual problems. This and his passionate love affair with his pupil Heloise eventually led to his downfall.

playing over a mesh backdrop, along with an omnipresent chorus of occasionally chanting monks add even darker strokes to the musical canvas.

Let me single out Patricia Rideout as Heloise's uncle's maid and Don McManus as the uncle: the first brought an unsuccessful touch of lightness, even though her voice is rich, and the second, a sturdy-voiced not-so-hot actor, stole the male lead. Emile Belcourt as Abelard's intellectual opponent was effective. Leon Major directed the opera—there wasn't enough good acting or proper stage motion, but in these opera always suffers.

So how do you listen to a new opera? You have to listen to one to find out.

Why is a course critique like a sex book?

By Linda McQuaig

Course evaluations are like sex books — after a while it all sounds the same.

Only so many courses can be "satisfying" and "fulfilling" and only so many professors can be "stimulating" and "responsive", before even the most lurid descriptions begin to have no more punch than the second page of a pornographic novel.

But is every professor really a thinking woman's Marlon Brando? Are things really as good as course evaluations seem to imply?

The History Students' Union doesn't think so, and in its introduction to the history course evaluation booklet this year has pinpointed the problem — students just aren't critical enough in their appraisals.

This is not to say a course never gets panned or highly praised, but the vast majority seem to fall into that safe middle ground where at least 60 per cent of the class says they would take the course again, knowing what they do about it at the end.

Reading course evaluations one gets the impression, in fact, that most students take the approach, "everybody's got good points and bad points". While this is probably true and both sides should be mentioned, the resulting impression is that it all sort of balances out. So, if a professor is weak at communicating the material in the course, he can make up for it by having a friendly, outgoing manner. Very rarely are the good and bad points weighed for their relative importance. Few attempts are made to synthesize strengths and weaknesses into a comprehensive critique.

Those putting together course evaluations have tried to encourage more critical analysis by students to list the main weaknesses of the course.

At this request, students manage to drag out every undesirable personal habit the professor could conceivably have, while rarely giving a larger picture of his shortcomings as a teacher — his approach to the subject, whether or not he is simplistic or superficial, etc.

A collection of these answers can be found in a special undistributed handbook put together by the students in the Political Economy Course Union. It could be easily marketed under the title, "Great one-liners from Course Evaluations."

One of the most popular complaints, for instance, is "he talks so fast it's hard to take notes." Conversely, a history prof was praised because "he talks slow enough, you can get it all down."

An economics professor was actually criticized because "he talks too fast — says too much in one sentence." Another economics professor was attacked for "looking like a dentist — he says 'uh' too often," and "his voice deviates too much." "His moustache got in the way of his mouth," was another bone of contention, and one professor gained the scorn of a student for his inability to control the class.

All is not bleak, however, on the course evaluation scene this year.

It was encouraging to discover among the placid commentaries in the history course evaluation an apparently analytical review of History 261, "Post Confederation Canada". A few lines from this unnamed piece of work are worth quoting:

"In reviewing this course, one gets the uncomfortable impression that the students were attending a night club, lost somewhere in the concrete bowels at Sidney Smith; that they were watching a rave new comedy team; that the performer professors were being rated on their attempts to vanquish the charge that Canadian history is both dull and uninspiring with a barrage of witty one-liners, and that, as a result, trivia reigned supreme. All three lecturers were rated on style rather than content, which, in all fairness, was only apt since that is the way they approached Canadian history."

The writer goes on to make a mockery of the balanced approach to evaluations: "Generally, the professor's lectures made up for their lack of critical historical insight with a wealth of trivia."

Perhaps the success of the evaluation lies in its subjectivity. The writer has taken the comments, added his own impressions and come up with an overall assessment of the worth of the course.

It was the fear of such subjectivity that led course evaluations into the hopeless and pointless pursuit of objectivity. So, we are faced with meaningless statistics like: 29 per cent found a certain professor stimulating, 38 per cent found him reasonably stimulating, 22 per cent found him only barely stimulating while 11 per cent found he did not stimulate them at all.

The ultimate absurdity of this approach was amply revealed in a review of History 232, "the British Imperial Experience". We are told that opinion on the professor was divided: "You either find him exciting and entertaining or boring and repetitive." Take your pick?

The Backdoor Theatre at 474 Ontario St. adds to the growing exploration of original Canadian plays with its presentation of Night Freight by J. Michael Yates and He Didn't Even Say Goodbye by Norman Williams. The plays run September 25 to October 28 on a pay-what-you-can basis. Phone 961-1505 or 964-1513 for reservations.

The Performing Theatre Company, styled as Toronto's only actor controlled commercial theatre organization, is taking its successful Look Back In Anger to the Actors' Theatre, 390 Dupont St., starting September 20. Student tickets are $2.50.

The Canadian Dance Drama Company presented its first full-length dance drama, Siddhartha, on Wednesday, September 19, at the Toronto Workshop Productions Theatre, 12 Alexander Street. Five evening performances are planned with a special 2:30 matinee on Saturday, September 22. Student prices are $2.50 but the matinee is only $1.50.

Theatre Passe Muraille opened its new season September 19 with Under The Greywacke. Developed and created leninism. At the same time, he stresses the Thompson, the play is about northern Ontario and follows the pattern of the first-rate Farm Show. It's in Trinity Church rather than the regular theatre and student tickets are $2.50.

David French's latest play, Of The Fields, Lately, doesn't officially open the Tarragon's new repertoire until Saturday, September 29, but preview performances are showing Wednesday to Friday, September 26 — 28 on a pay-what-you-can basis. The Tarragon also continues its 2:30 Sunday matinees on the pay-something idea.

books

A stimulating and important book by French marxist Andre Gorz is now available in English. It's Socialism and Revolution (Anchor Press Doubleday, $2.25). Once compared to Herbert Marcuse for his stress on the powerful ideological and psychological web that permeates every aspect of everyday life, Gorz shows here that he is far from being steeped in the notorious Marcusean pessimism.

Gorz belongs to the oft-suppressed 'third tradition' of socialism: the tradition of libertarian socialism that is fiercely critical of both social democracy and leninism. At the same time, he stresses the need for a revolutionary party—but a mass, democratic party.

Although a collection of essays, the book is remarkably unified in the development of its arguments. He deals with a number of fundamental issues: imperialism, unions, functions of a revolutionary party, reformism, the "ideological front", the state, work, leisure and culture, changes in the working class. The discussion of students and workers is especially valuable.

Vehicle: Handbook of Toronto Cultural Resources, edited by Isobel Harry and Marlene Sober, published by A Space (85 St. Nicholas St. 920-3628) is — surprise! — exactly what it claims to be. Financed by a Local Initiatives Program grant—no surprise—it contains sections on the performing arts, the visual arts, schools and institutions, and community access television.

music

Grand Opera reigns supreme this week, with Barber of Seville tonight and Monday night. Tomorrow at 2 p.m. it's the Merry Widow, also on Thursday night. Tomorrow night's show is Verdi's Rigoletto, with Louis Quilico in the star role.

The premiere of Beethoven's only opera Fidelio is on Tuesday night, and Wednesday sees the last performance of the Canadian work, Heloise and Abelard.

So far, the season has been an unqualified success for the Canadian Opera Company, with its courageous presentation of both the Heloise and the expensive Gottterdammerung by Wagner. Audiences have been good, with sell-outs frequent, and this pattern is likely to continue throughout the rest of the Company's twenty-fifth season.

All the performances are at O'Keefe Centre, at 8:15 p.m. sharp. (Matinees at 2). Ticket prices range from $3.50 to $11.00, but get to the box office early if you don't have yours yet — they go fast.

A different sort of musical experience will be discussed in the Thursday afternoon series lecture at the Faculty of Music. Dr. Dominique-Rene de Lema, the director of the Black Music Centre at Indiana University will give a lecture entitled "Concert Music and the Black Composer". Third World Culture fans take note.

The coverage is comprehensive, if not very intensive; if you want to know what a particular institution or resource does, how you can get to use it, etc., then this booklet is for you. At the same time, the approach is pedestrian, and smacks of LIPish make-work in places. Each theatre or gallery rates two photographs, one of the building, one of the interior. It's hard to know why: pictures of Hart House or empty stage sets aren't that compellingly interesting. The money spent on that might have been spent more fruitfully in producing more than a mere 1000 copies. And some updating is needed too.

But let's not be too critical: anything that tries to make cultural resources more widely known and used is surely a step in the right direction. (For an example of the rarified snobbery of institutionalized culture, see the latest seasonal program of

Pocket Books (Canada) has reprinted a book about a sensational murder trial that shook Toronto in the early 1940's. After two hung juries, a third produced a conviction of airforce man Bill Newell, for the murder of his wife on Toronto Island. Published originally as This Man Hanged Himself, the book been reissued as The Walk and the Kiss, with a cover making it look like a Yonge Street sex novel.

Anyone hoping to get their jollies that way, however, would be advised to keep looking. The Walk and the Kiss is by Canadian historian, Edwin C. Guillet, author of such others thrillers as Coburg 1798-1948, The Story of Canadian Roads, and The Valley of the Trent — one of the breed of academics up to his ears in the great conspiracy to make Canadian history seem as dull as possible.

All the evidence is exhaustively examined, however, and there are pictures and maps given so if you're into tracing the events of the murder, book in hand, looking for long-buried clues, this may be the book for you. If you're not, forget it.

Another reprint is Essays on Marx's Theory of Value, by I.I. Rubin, $2.50 published by Black Rose Books in Canada, Black & Red in the US. Published originally in the 1920's it was suppressed by Stalin and Co. and never reissued; this is the first English version. A difficult book it is nonetheless a brilliant discussion of concepts at the root of marxism: the theory of value and commodity fetishism, concepts intimately connected to Marx's understanding of alienation and the necessity of revolution.

Not for everyone, but a useful antidote for those plagued beyond endurance by the ilk of economists Paul Samuelson and John Kenneth Galbraith.

The big musical event of this weekend won't cost you a cent. It's a FREE FESTIVAL beginning tomorrow at noon (running till 10 pm) on the Hart House front lawn. The event has very wisely been sponsored by SAC, TANC, and the Toronto Musicians Association. Featured performers will include: String Band, Audiomaster Electric (formerly Huron and Washington), Killow Mountain Band, Bruce Miller, Path, Rough Trade and Dave Bacca. Free food will be provided by Jubilation.

If you attended the Mariposa Folk Festival this summer you probably heard a white blues performer named John Hammond, because he drew the LARGEST crowds whenever he played. Hammond is at the RIVERBOAT, 134 Yorkville (922-6216), tonight through Sunday. Accompanying himself with harmonica and guitar, Hammond lays back some extraordinary acoustic folk-blues with ease. Not only did he show himself to be a master of the guitar and the harmonica but he's probably one of the few who can coordinate both at once without letting one instrument dominate. Hammond's most effective on driving blues songs, like "Come Back Baby", that are interspersed with sensitive fleeting guitar riffs, behind a gruff imperative voice. His performance of "Wang Dang Doodle", highlighted by the percussive interplay between his guitar and stompin' foot, is the definitive version of that Willie Dixon song. Go early so you can get a seat where you can see the guitar work (the Riverboat is poorly designed for audience comfort). Admission is $3.50. Next week it's back to the days of the early sixties folk boom with another blues artist, Dave Van Ronk, from Wednesday to Saturday, September 26-30.

You couldn't be much better situated for movie-going. The big theatres show everything but the real hard-core porn for $3 a ticket. There's nothing compelling around at the moment, but The Day of the Jackal at the Hyland (St. Clair subway stop) and A Touch of Class at the Hollywood (next door to the Hyland) are nice. Friday's Globe (yellow section) and Saturday's Star have the most complete listings. Watch the little ads for some good second-run double bills at places like the Mount Pleasant.

Usually the prices and movies are better at the various repertory theatres and special showings.

On campus: St. Mike's traditionally shows an eclectic selection of one or two-year-old movies.

SAC has a Friday night series at the Medical Building auditorium, beginning tonight with Woody Allen's Take the Money and Run, plus a Captain Marvel serial at 8 and 10 for a buck. OISE shows good films very badly twice a week. (When they finished the building they had leftover tinted glass so they used it for the projection booth windows.) Not recommended. Sunday nights the Cinema of Solidarity shows political films, beginning this week with Report from Japan. $1.25 at Med. Sci. proceeds going to Mozambique revolutionaries. And

Last tenants leave South St. Jamestown

The last tenants have moved out of the South of St. Jamestown area, after a bitter four-year war, and Meridian is levelling some of the last houses in the block bounded by Bleecker, Wellesley, Ontario and Carlton Streets.

The house at 540 Ontario Street, formerly emblazoned with the South of St. Jamestown Tenants' Union sign, was vacated by the family of Freddy Sharpe, John Whitelaw, a tenant organizer, and some roomers, two weeks ago.

The house is now boarded up, and a security guard sits on the stoop.

According to Whitelaw, the mechanics of running the house became too much. The tenants were in arrears in paying the gas bill, and the gas was shut off.

The tenants, Whitelaw said, were also under surveillance.

Evictions in the South St. Jamestown area have been characterized by harassment and fighting. In the summer of 1970, after tenants had been given notice to get out, Meridian rented the houses to Ward Seven Alderman John Sewell, who turned them over to a co-operative tenants' organization.

Each following summer brought bodily evictions, when Meridian attempted to take over the houses and tear them down. In 1972, tenants chained themselves to radiators, to prevent the sheriff's men from throwing them out.

Whitelaw said, because of this tradition of violence, the last tenants decided to leave to avoid a confrontation, and possible danger to the Sharpe family's three children.

The house adjoining 540 Ontario was torn down about a month ago.

In June, the South of St. Jamestown Tenants' Union applied to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for $30,000 to research a plan for non-profit housing in the area. A decision from CMHC is expected this month.

There has been some talk of the City acquiring Meridian's South of St. Jamestown block.

However, Meridian has been slowly but surely levelling all of the buildings in the area. So far City Council has only acquired land from private developers that contained buildings of architectural importance threatened by redevelopment.

The South of St. Jamestown tenants and other community groups are attempting to bring Meridian before the Ontario Royal Commission on violence in the building industry. Although the commission has been hearing evidence about the lathing and plastering sector of the industry, the tenants claim that the tactics used by Meridian, Greenwin, and Cadillac in evicting tenants from buildings they intend to demolish, also constitutes violence in the construction industry.

The former Meridian tenants are preparing a letter to the commissioner.

The St. Jamestown area already houses about ten thousand tenants in the area bounded by Wellesley, Howard, Bleecker, and Parliament Streets. The area is congested with traffic, and has practically no park space within the one quarter mile specified by Toronto's Official Plan.

Early this summer, the Ontario Municipal Board approved yet another three giant buildings to be built by Meridian on the block known as West St. Jamestown. However, community groups appealed that decision to the Ontario Cabinet, and the cabinet is still sitting on a verdict.

FUET still popular

Enrollment at the Faculty of Education remains the same as last year despite warning letters outlining the employment situation sent to most incoming students.

These letters, written by the Continuity and Election Committee, the body of students temporarily in charge of the Students' Union, attempted to provide the most up-to-date information concerning hiring and placement of recent graduates in teaching positions.

The Committee felt it necessary to give students the facts, to show them what they were getting into. To date, only 47 per cent of 1973 grads have found jobs in teaching.

At most colleges of education in the province, enrollment has dropped slightly in view of education cutbacks. Faculty of Education registrar Alcie Elliott saw this as encouraging for the U of T students. She felt that this was evidence of a settling in the teaching profession.

Quoting from a recent newsletter from the Ministry, she stated that approximately 12,000 job openings would be available in 1974 for education graduates.

But the reliability of this information is questionable, according to Paul McGowan, former Students' Union Executive member.

In general, students at the Faculty are optimistic. Most questioned felt that they would be able to find jobs, if not in Toronto, at least in some small town.

One student remarked, "This is just another year at university."

Nobody likes loan plan

By LIZ MORRISON

The new government program of financial assistance to part-time students in the form of high-interest loans has met with disapproval from both administration and student representatives at U of T.

The Association of Part-Time Undergraduate Students (APUS) expressed dissatisfaction with the plan, while Student Awards Director P. Phillips said that the announcement came too late for the students to take advantage of the loan plan. The plan was announced Tuesday by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Phillips says most of the part-time students will have had to make other financial arrangements for this year anyway, since intention to register had to be given in July.

He said he would be surprised if more than one or two per cent of the 12,000 part-time graduate and undergraduate students apply for the loans. Only a few dozen students have made inquiries and many of those have been deterred by the high interest rate. The deadline for applying for the loans is October 31.

Soccer Blues lose with poor offence

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues demonstrated inept offence on Tuesday at Varsity Stadium, losing 1-0 to the McMaster Marauders in a game dominated territorially by the host squad.

If such woeful finishing continues the Toronto team will be hard-pressed to repeat as Ontario champs. This defeat in the opening league encounter compares unfavourably with last season's unbeaten schedule.

The opening play was scrappy with neither club showing good ball control or tactical command. Too often the player on the ball was caught in possession or forced to make a hurried, and therefore inaccurate, pass.

The main tactic of the marauders was the lofted high ball through the centre to Mike Szkwara and Duncan Martin. By virtue of the forwards' size they proved awkward, but not threatening, so that Geoff Crewe and Herb Dubsky were usually able to clear the Blues' lines with minimal difficulty. The Blues, on the other hand, having a physically smaller band of forwards, concentrated on the low pass, which proved ineffective due to its overly hasty execution.

At the 17 minute mark McMaster scored the game's only goal, the result of alert play by an attacker taking the half-chance. The inevitable high ball from the McMaster midfield was played to the Blues left, whence it was immediately relayed waist-high back to the middle.

Moving quickly in anticipation, Szkwara was first to the cross and hit a volley across the goal; the ball hit the right-hand post and bounced into the net. This chance was the first presented by the Blues' defenders, but they paid the full penalty.

From this point on the game became monotonous in its pattern, for the Toronto team pressed forward almost constantly, only to be frustrated by its own inability to score. With Tim Burns demonstrating his midfield skills, the Blues began to function as a team unit and, unlike in the early play, began to pass the ball with more accuracy and speed. However, in the main, the players did not concentrate on exploiting the weakness in defence on the Marauder left, where a slowness to turn was apparent.

The best chance for the Blues, coming after forty minutes, did not fall to a forward. Noticing an overlapping run by John Cobby, Dave Evans promptly directed a through ball into the path of the onrushing midfielder player, who hit a first-time shot from 25 yards out.

To the relief on the beaten Marauder goalie, Graham Cochran, the ball hit the woodwork and rebounded to safety.

In the second half the unidirectional traffic continued, but this time with the emphasis on the Toronto right. The predominant attacking force came from defender Iain Slimmon who ran willingly and forcefully on the ball, causing consternation in the opposing rearguard.

Blues (on the right) battle for control in McMaster zone in game marked by strong defence, weak finishing.

When he reverted to his defensive duties the offence became noticeably less threatening. The defence and the midfield were virtual masters of the field, controlling the play and setting up numerous opportunities for the offence.

By a combination of a lack of bite and slowness to cross the ball or run into open positions, the territorial domination of the game was not converted into a shooting gallery on the visiting goalkeeper.

In the hope that Slimmon's drive could force the decisive opportunity, coach Bob Nicol moved him from defence to replace Vito Polera on the right wing. Shortly thereafter a crossed ball was directed to Burns who headed a brief chance wide of the goalkeeper, but also inches to the outside of the left post. Again a midfielder had created a scoring chance by his effort.

The final clear scoring chance also fell to a midfielder player. Cobby, having made space in the penalty area, received a pass from Peter Hillier; his low shot was charged down by two of the packed Marauder defenders.

Following the game, coach Nicol expressed his displeasure with Toronto team's attacking play. He noted the club "lacks a leader at the front, one who can carry the lead for the forward line."

"This is the first season for many years that goal scorer of Mario Da Rosa's mould (big and strong) is lacking. However, this is no excuse. How can one play 270 minutes in exhibition and league play, without scoring a goal, particularly against an inferior McMaster team?"

Obviously, changes in tactics or personnel must be under consideration. Whether Blues can finally score that elusive goal will be the question on Saturday when Guelph visits Varsity Stadium for a 1 pm kickoff.

Scar outlasts Blues

By JAMES MACDONALD

A Blues rugby team composed largely of rookies went down to defeat 18-10 against Scarborough Rugby Club on Tuesday evening. This non-league game showed a general lack of condition in the Blues' pack.

The Blues scored first as Paul Kitchen went to the corner after a movement by the backs from a penalty kick 35 yards out. The try was not converted.

Five minutes later, at the ten minute mark, Kitchen broke through a number of Scarborough players on a long run to the goal-line where he passed off to Rodger Wright who put the ball down between the posts to give Toronto another four points. Bruce Carroll converted to make it 10-0 for the Blues.

At this point Toronto's attack began to die and a see-saw battle developed in their half of the field. Scarborough finally drove through from a scrum ten yards out as Eric Seeri, a former Blues player, gave a fine display of running and passing and Chris Bouris dove in for the score. There was no conversion, and Blues were left ahead at 10-4.

Now Toronto became very sloppy and at the 30 minute mark Bouris was able to intercept an ill-timed Blues pass at midfield. This play resulted in a Scarborough scrum one yard from the Toronto goal-line and in classic style the Scarborough forwards pulled the ball over to score. The try was not converted.

Early in the second half Scarborough was awarded a penalty kick 15 yards out. Seeri put it over easily to pull his team ahead 11-10. From here on in Scarborough never looked back and it was only a few minutes later that their forwards bulled their way over from a five yard penalty kick. The try went unconverted.

However, the Toronto team gave it another try when a good midfield kick by Kitchen gave them a scrum only two yards out. Scarborough's superior weight and strength came through to allow their forwards to win the ball. A good kick by their fullback to the sideline cleared them of any danger.

Throughout the rest of the game Scarborough pressed hard and was finally rewarded with three more points when Seeri booted over another penalty from 20 yards out. This finished the scoring as Toronto staved off further vigorous Scarborough attacks.

The Scarborough team dominated the scrums throughout the game, rarely losing the ball. The Blues lacked the weight and strength in this area, and when you don't have the ball it is very hard to score.

Scarborough also demonstrated some fine kicking on the run which constantly put them in good position. The Toronto rookies can learn a lesson since they showed little talent in this area.

This game was designed to get the newer Blues players into a game situation. Their greatest problem last year was their late start; the organization and early training this year have overcome that obstacle. With a large and enthusiastic turnout of newcomers this year combined with the corps of returning veterans, Toronto looks to have fine chances for some rugby titles this year.

Croquet comes to Massey

By BRIANE NASIMOK and CHRIS ROBINSON

Yesterday afternoon marked the opening of the training camp of one of the most ignored inter-collegiate sports at the U of T. The Graduate Students Croquet Club held practices and an intra-squad match at Massey College in preparation for league play.

Led by Paul Brown, who was the slam-away winner of yesterday's tryouts, the team displayed a keen ability to put the ball through the hoops. Also attending the practice match were Ian Brown and Walter van Nus.

The general level of play was quite high for pre-season work-outs. There was a noticeable lack of finesse on long shots, but croques were well-placed and vigorously executed. Team morale seemed high.

The croqueteers are well-stocked with the blue blood needed for high level competition, but they will face an uphill battle in wresting the title away from the defending champion Toronto Croquet, Skittles, and Cricket Club (TCSCC).

Coach Bruce Bowden consented to a brief interview. His strategy remains a secret, but his early training camp included a strenuous program of calisthenics and wind training. "Most people don't realize it, but croquet is a very taxing sport, requiring peak physical condition for successful competition."

Massey College has been noted in recent years for its academic nature. Architect Jack Diamond called it "an elitist enclave". Bowden, also Head of Massey, suggested its entry into inter-collegiate sports might change this image.

Regardless, we look forward to this new and exciting intercollegiate competition at U of T.

Dr. Henry Morgentaler received support Saturday from followers who support his stand on abortion

Demonstration supports doctor

By MIKE EDWARDS

About 100 men and women marched on Yonge St., and demonstrated at City Hall Saturday afternoon in defense of Montreal physician Dr. Henry Morgentaler, who has been running an abortion clinic since 1969.

Morgentaler faces trial today on 13 counts of performing illegal abortions. In 1970, he was already charged on two counts, and the case has twice been appealed to the Supreme Court.

Bob Anderson, SAC president, spoke to the crowd at City Hall on behalf of the students at U of T. He said that Doctor Morgentaler had "done more to repeal the abortion laws than any other person". The U of T SAC ran a referendum in March 1972, in which 70 per cent of the respondents called for repeal.

Toronto psychiatrist Dr. Gus Tolentino, also spoke, and openly declared that he was as complicit in the "crime" of abortion as was Dr. Morgentaler. He referred to a recent statement by Dr. Morgentaler concerning the laying of charges and subsequent arrest. "He is now more convinced than ever that the law is cruel, unjust and dangerous to women," said Dr. Tolentino.

Dr. Morgentaler, under the terms of his release from jail is unable to leave the province, unable to continue his work at the clinic, and unable to talk on the subject of abortion at any public gathering.

His predicament was described as "government persecution" by the rally co-chairman and campaign coordinator, Stanley Gershtman.

The march, which started from Trinity Square was spirited with the demonstrators chanting "The real criminal is the law" and "drop the charges, set them free, Morgentaler, Macchabee". Dr. Macchabee is an assistant to Dr. Morgentaler, and was arrested on the basis of a CTV newsprogram concerning work in the clinic.

At one point in the march the demonstrators passed the United Farm Workers pickets who are conducting a boycott campaign. The marchers greeted each other with clenched fists and all shouted out "boycott-boycott".

Other speakers at the rally included Dr. Jerry Green, who accused Jerome Choquette Quebec Justice Minister, Prime Minister Trudeau, and Premier Bourassa, among others, of conspiracy to silence Doctor Morgentaler. He described the present legal methods of obtaining an abortion as humiliating and dehumanizing.

June Callwood, from the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, spoke and expressed her support through that organization. A telegram was read from Alderperson Dorothy Thomas which appealed to everyone to "support Dr. Morgentaler in everyway possible".

Eleanor Pelrine, singled out the Catholic Church for "pushing the viewpoint of a minority onto the majority of the Canadian people". Pelrine is the author of "Abortion in Canada", a leader in the abortion law repeal movement, and an outspoken NDP candidate in the last federal election.

The last speaker at the rally was Laurie Belovich, a student at the U of T Faculty of Education. She spoke for the U of T Women for Abortion Law Repeal and spoke of the continuing work at the U of T necessary to free Dr. Morgentaler and to repeal the law.

She said "If we accept the charges, it means that we accept the law which brings misery, mutilation and death to women. We will not respect the law; we cannot accept the charges."

The march was organized by the Toronto Committee to Defend Doctor Morgentaler, and was largely supported by the Canadian Women's Coalition to Repeal the Abortion Laws.

Vietnam prisoners increasing

Sept 24/73

By DAVID SIMMONDS
Detainment and torture of political prisoners in South Vietnam has actually increased since the ceasefire, says Jane Barton, a physiotherapist who has just returned from two years work in Quang Nai province with the American Friends Service Committee.

Barton, and her husband David, were speaking at a meeting last Friday held at OISE, sponsored by the "International Committee to Free South Vietnamese Prisoners from Detention, Torture and Death".

The meeting coincided with an international week of protest concerning the plight of prisoners in South Vietnam.

David Barton noted that the United States government spends $20-million annually in direct support of the prison system in Vietnam. In addition he claimed 400 CIA agents in Vietnam keep well in formed of the treatment of prisoners.

The Bartons related their experiences in treating prisoners who had been beaten, crippled and blinded in the infamous "tiger cage" prisons. They expressed concern that although alleged maltreatment of American prisoners has received wide publicity, reports of treatment of prisoners in South Vietnam have been effectively suppressed.

David Barton spoke of making representations to the International Commission of Control and Supervision in Vietnam, of which Canada was a member. However, the ICSS representatives claimed that the issue of prisoners was not part of their mandate.

The meeting was shown a film made by Granada Television of Great Britain, entitled "South Vietnam: a question of torture". The film showed many ex-prisoners - some who had been detained for up to 14 years - forced to propel themselves along the ground with the use of their arms. They had been shackled for so long that they had lost the use of their legs. One woman described being blinded by lime thrown into her face; and another of her two 15 year-old daughters who had been forced to drink large quantities of water, after which soldiers beat their stomachs, forcing them to vomit.

President Thieu has often claimed that there are no political prisoners in South Vietnam. David Barton described seeing prisoners with the words "political prisoner" inscribed on their identity tags.

The meeting was also addressed by Andrew Brewin, federal NDP member for Greenwood, who called the plight of the prisoners "one of the greatest tragedies which humanity has had to experience".

United Farmworkers parade in Toronto

About 30 people, mainly California farmworkers, stood on Yonge street corners Saturday, carrying huge signs reading "Boycott U.S.A. Grapes and Lettuce."

The demonstration was part of the United Farm Workers campaign to have California grapes and lettuce banned from Toronto stores. Toronto is the fifth largest consumer of California grapes in North America.

The Farmworkers have been negotiating with chain stores and smaller markets, and are meeting with some success. According to one campaign worker, the grapes are arriving in bruised condition because they are badly picked by machines and scab labour.

The boycott is being revived in the U.S. and Canada because of efforts by the grape and lettuce growers and the Teamsters Union to break the UFW, which has been on strike since July.

The strike has been a particularly violent one, with many picket line injuries and arrests, as the Teamsters and the growers attempt to revive the contract system of hiring farm labour through a middleman, who takes a healthy cut of the picker's earnings.

Cheap housing for faculty

By KEN CLARK

Did you know that U of T faculty can get loans for houses cheaper than you or I? The Staff Housing Loan Scheme was set up about fifteen years ago during the boom years for higher education, when many people saw a university education for everyone as the way to "civilize mankind."

The universities were growing like weeds and needed to sweeten their fringe benefits in the competition to get and keep good faculty. (People who buy houses are intending to stay - Get it?)

Under the provisions of the plan faculty members can borrow money toward the purchase of a house from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. This loan is guaranteed by the University's so, the bank charges a lower than normal interest rate. Many other universities in Ontario have similar schemes.

The scheme is currently being revamped in consultation with the Faculty Association and the Staff Association. Nonfaculty staff members are going to be let into the scheme. The faculty seem to have taken advantage of this benefit—the loans currently outstanding total $4.2 million.

Fairview: the big deal

The Eaton-Fairview development, was the last major development approved by City Council before last December's municipal election, and might well represent one of the city's last big giveaways.

Fairview Corporation, which was the developer for the Toronto Dominion Centre and Fairview mall, came before city committees and Council in 1971 and 1972, asking not for rezoning, but for City-owned land in the form of streets and lanes. Under the existing zoning, Fairview could already build two and one-half T.D. Centres, according to calculations by John Sewell.

The plan which Fairview presented was to be developed in two parts, with the first phase being started within three years, and the last phase, to begin as late as ten years after.

The first phase will include a new Eaton store to be built on the corner of Yonge and Dundas, and a glorified three-storey Fairview shopping mall, facing on Yonge Street.

The two structures would eliminate all of the unusual jumble of stores that are now facing Yonge Street, including U of T's 188 Yonge, now considered by the Toronto Historical Board as an architecturally significant building, and other interesting land marks, such as the old Northway's store, at 240 Yonge Street, described by U of T fine art teacher Douglas Richardson, as "one of the most beautiful early twentieth century skyscrapers."

Holy Trinity Church, which had announced its own plans for redevelopment in 1972, in response to the first overshadowing and engulfing Eaton's proposal, will lose its access along Trinity Lane to Yonge Street, and will gain in return a park on city-owned land on Louisa Street to the south.

Two buildings, the historic Scadding House, and the old Rectory, will be moved from their present locations on Trinity Lane to the south west, and will be replanted to overlook the park.

The second phase of the Fairview development along Bay Street will include among other buildings two office towers of unspecified location and unspecified height, will not be undertaken for at least ten years.

In the weighty development agreement that City Council approved in November of last year, the City, in an uneven exchange, gave Fairview 111,103 square feet of city streets and lanes, and part of Trinity Square in exchange for 85,352 square feet in strips of land along Yonge, Queen, and Bay Streets, which the City would use for widening streets, and sidewalks and would serve the new development. The City will also be given surface rights of way, but not possession, of 32,779 more feet that would allow access to the small park in front of Trinity Church. According to the City Commissioner of Real Estate, land values in the area were $52.15 a square foot.

The new City Council has already blocked the widening of Dundas Street, for which the land was originally to be acquired this year.

To service the new Eaton-Fairview development, the TTC has agreed to alterations in the subway system, which according to current estimates, will cost over $2 million.

The TTC, also recommends in a January 10 report, that streetcars be removed from Dundas street between Bay and Yonge by 1975, to facilitate access to an 800-car parking garage on the south side of Dundas.

As to where the street cars will be re-routed, if they will be, sources are not clear.

In return for these concessions from the city, Fairview agreed to not to overshadow Holy Trinity Church, although no guarantees were given to leave the city-owned park at the front of the church in the sun. Fairview refused to insure it would build a connecting pedestrian walkway between Simpson's and the new Eaton's store.

Fairview came before the city's committee of adjustment last week to obtain permission to divide the Eaton-Fairview holding into parcels for redevelopment, and to transfer air rights from one part of the super-block to another.

Because of the complicated nature of these transactions, which neither committee members, nor groups opposing the development could understand, a decision was deferred for two weeks.

However, some observers suspect it is actually a ploy to gain higher density for certain sections of the block. When the development came before City Hall in 1972, Fairview refused to accept any height limitations.

Because the City already gave the laneways and roads the land in exchange to Fairview, the City has no lever with which to control the development. However, groups like the Better Downtown Planning Corporation, will try to fight the development on the grounds that it is a major development, and the closing of streets in the area will create a serious traffic crisis.

Furthermore, the development itself will attract increased traffic, and parking spaces will be provided for at least one thousand cars, not counting temporary parking lots that will be permitted by the city on land Fairview will clear off buildings.

There is also another sections of the planning act which require detailed studies of areas which are to sustain major redevelopment, or if a development is premature or contrary to the public interest.

Opponents point to the fact that the downtown area already has a 15 per cent rate of office vacancy, and the Metro Centre redevelopment will add even more to the office space surplus in the downtown.

Greg King, the lawyer to be retained by Better Downtown Planning Corp., also maintains that the division of land that Fairview is seeking at the Committee of Adjustment could be construed as a subdivision, and therefore might require approval by the Provincial Government.

Chrysler workers back on job with contract

Just 63 hours after workers struck North American Chrysler plants on September 14, the United Auto Workers reached a tentative agreement with management, and after weekend voting on the new contract, workers will return to work today.

Under the old contract, production workers received $4.51 an hour plus a 29 cent cost of living allowance. Now, in the first year of the new contract, workers will receive $4.87 and hour plus a 5 cent cost of living allowance. This represents an overall 12 cent hourly increase in wages. Although overtime does not include the cost of living factor, Workers will earn more by working overtime under the new contract. The increase is viewed as an incentive to work overtime.

On the issue of forced overtime workers in Canada will decide if they work more than 8 hours in a day or 48 hours in a week. Nonetheless, workers still face a 6 day week.

The new pension scheme allows a Canadian worker to retire after 30 years of service but because of interlocking arrangements with the Canada Pension Plan, he must wait until he is 55 years of age to receive the full benefits.

In the U.S., workers can retire at any age after 30 years service. Both in Canada and the United States, the 30 years must be spent with Chrysler even though the UAW represents workers at many other companies.

A new dental care plan is quite extensive but does not take effect until next year. As a UAW spokesman said, "You only get what you pay for."

In addition a company-union committee is investigating unsafe working conditions and has a "hotline" to both UAW headquarters and management. After the committee's final report, the right to refuse an unsafe job will technically cease to be an issue.

At last parity has been achieved with U.S. auto workers. Parity, in and of itself, however, should not be confused with the issue of a decent wage. The contract provides for a 3 per cent wage increase per year for the next three years. Added to this are the cost of living allowance and an annual improvement rate.

Chrysler's Windsor office refused to respond to questions on the contract but read a statement circulated by William O'Brien, Vice-President of Personnel, which read as follows:

"Chrysler is very pleased with the terms of the new contract. We are hopeful that ratification will be completed this week and that the company will be able to resume operations as soon as possible."

Chrysler is enjoying record profits this year, and prices on the '74 model cars have been upped by about 370.

Already the Windsor local has ratified the agreement, but with fewer than half its members voting. The Ajax plant approved the contract with 78 per cent of the heavy voter turn-out approving the agreement.

Omitted from the agreement were a number of important issues. Line speed, racism, and unequal treatment for women received no mention. 30 hours work for 40 hours pay which is being advocated by Workers Action Movement (WAM) with considerable success among workers also passed without mention.

Despite the early agreement there has been a significant amount of dissent especially before the actual strike. In August a number of wildcats occurred at Detroit Chrysler plants. The most crucial was at the Mack frame assembly plant. WAM and communists in the Progressive Labour Party PLP led a sit-down here over the firing of a worker and over unsafe working conditions.

Bill Gilbreth, a member of WAM and PLP, was fired for organizing a work stoppage in protest of bad working conditions. He returned to the plant the next day and mobilized a sit-in. Between 40 and 50 people took part while 200 demonstrated their support outside the plant despite a court injunction.

According to the Detroit Free

Press about 1000 Detroit-area UAW officials armed with bats and canes reopened the plant after strikers had staged a two day sit-in. In the process several strikers were beaten up. Earlier riot-police had entered the plant and removed most of the strikers in a series of attacks which even the UAW opposed.

The Free Press quoted veteran labour organizers as saying that this was the first time in history that UAW officials have physically sided with police in opening a plant. The union felt this action was necessary to ensure success at the contract talks with Chrysler. Douglas Fraser, a UAW vice-president, went further voicing his approval of Chrysler's decision not to submit to workers' grievances.

The wild-cats had demanded job security, health and safety measures, and 30 hours work for 40 hours pay. As a direct result of the sit-in, Chrysler backed down and completed a variety of safety features. The original work stoppage occurred only after all grievance procedures had been exhausted.

Commenting on the above events Jerry Hartford, Public Relations Director of UAW Canada, said that WAM's numbers were "pretty minuscule... rather pitiful! He mentioned that there has always been an element of dissent in the UAW and that a few leftist groups were trying to organize auto workers. WAM, he went on, is just "another fermentation off on the left" but "on a given day could raise quite a ruckus."

Mr. Hartford denied any strike-breaking efforts by UAW officials and stated that charges to one contrary were "charges of a highly partisan group and should be taken as such". However, workers from the Mack plant speaking at a recent WAM convention, verified statements on violence made by the Detroit Free Press.

The sit-in at Mack Avenue in August was particularly vital because it threatened to shut down all of Chrysler which depends on the Mack plant for frames. The sit-in was led by communists.

Historically, communists have led the fight for a shorter work week and have played a key role in forming unions.

A Douglas Aircraft worker from Toronto's local 1967, said that several years ago workers at that plant were sent back to work by the UAW even though the local had rejected the contract offer. He then added "what can you do when your own union won't support you". The alternative he insisted is the building of WAM which has fought union sell-outs.

Hermant may be helping Eaton's

"He reminds one of Cromwell smashing into the effete Parliament of Charles I; or of Cecil Rhodes founding a commonwealth among savages." Thus said a sentence out of a company history about Timothy Eaton in 1919. If Tim knew what kind of dirt his family's name was now being dragged through he would likely be whirling in his grave.

But Eaton's (Tim that is) comparison with Cromwell and Rhodes is most apt in the year 1973. For like those two great British colonizers, Eaton's family has over the years colonized the downtown core of riff-raff shops. Lately it's been zeroing in on the Dundas to Queen area from Yonge Street to Bay. Its partner is that ever-growing giant Fairview corporation, the construction arm of the Brompton distilling empire.

And the subject of all the controversy is something we dug up during the summer — 188 Yonge Street — a house formerly owned by a woman named Naomi Bilton but willed to the University of Toronto in 1922 with the stipulation that it never be sold to the Eaton family. So Eaton's is circumventing any formal legal or legislative necessity through the university's sale of the land to Fairview.

The Last Post magazine's editorial collective in 1970 described the Eaton empire in the following words: "It is one of the most powerful concentrations of wealth, economic power and political influence in Canada, ranking with E.P. Taylor's Argus Corporation, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and Power Corporation. It is also an empire that wields this imposing power whenever something stands in its way."

So U of T better not stand in its way! The Governing Council is made up of 16 provincial appointees, most of them businessmen, and some of them are probably familiar with the Eaton power — kind of a pain by association.

The Last Post study went on to document some interesting facts: "While propagating the mythology that it was only interested in serving the interests of the country and its people, it (the Eaton company) wrote a history of reaction, manipulation and entrenchment, erecting a tower of wealth on a mountain of low salaries, poor working conditions, and arbitrary management."

"...The power Eaton's wields through its vast wealth, and the abandon with which the company exercises it, is illustrated by its massive land deals over the past decades.

"In several cities, Eaton's has amassed large segments of vital downtown land, kept it unused and frozen by not developing it until it suited its purposes, and when it finally did, forced the local city councils into rezoning surrounding areas to accommodate the company's needs.

"...A family that has distributed millions through official charities, that builds churches and monuments and finances entire machine-gun batteries for the war, yet used its financial leverage to work against the public good, control newspapers, and erect its splendid cathedral of opulence on a mountain of poor wages and arbitrary, dictatorial and paternalistic management." (The historical evidence is in Last Post, Volume 1, Number 2).

Eaton's has tried to strip and control the downtown core of most of Canada's major cities — Montreal, Vancouver, and lately, Toronto. So it comes as little surprise that its behind-the-scenes corporate power has come into play with the Reitman's store — 188 Yonge St. — whose property the university now owns.

The matter finally came out into the open last Thursday at the monthly Governing Council meeting noticeably Sydnese Hermant, owner and president of Imperial Optical commented that "if the university decided not to sell the property it would be standing in the way of the greatest development in the centre of the city on the North American continent, and one which the city council has approved" (this according to the University of Toronto administration's newspaper, the Bulletin).

The Bulletin also goes on to write about Hermant: "He did not not think there was any moral issue, since one cannot bind the use of land indefinitely. 'By selling we are acceding to a request from the whole metropolitan area; the action is perfectly sound, acceptable, legal, and constructive.'"

Ah yes, but is it moral and ethical? Just by coincidence the Hermant Building is located at 21 Dundas Square. And guess who owns the Hermant Building. Right! Sidney and his family firm. So perhaps Mr. Hermant's somewhat interested in seeing the value of this property increase. If he decided not to sell to the adjacent Eaton Centre, the additional traffic and the increase in land value to Hermant's property might stand in the way of his forming a clear perspective on the use of U of T's property — 188 Yonge.

Perhaps the Governing Council should be looking into the question of conflict of interest, for undoubtedly Mr. Hermant stands to gain by the sale of Reitman's — it will solidify the Eaton block and provide a united downtown (Queen to Dundas) strip. Sidney Hermant and John David Eaton's family — partners in development? Perhaps, and along with them, the Governing Council.

And further surprise, Hermant's family also controls a real estate company — Paja Realty, which buys offices and real estate for his company, Imperial Optical. The firm is named after Hermant's sons — Peter, John Andrew and Adam. It might be interesting to see what other property PAJA Realty owns in the downtown core, perhaps even a chunk of investment with Eaton's?

And after the detail in the Last Post article about such a fine upstanding corporate citizen as the T. Eaton Company, do Mr. Hermant and the Governing Council want to continue their dealings with 188 Yonge St. and its sale to the Eaton Company?

Is Sidney Hermant involved with the Eaton Centre in more than a geographical way — financially and developmentally? And will the Governing Council investigate the possibility of conflict of interest? Stay tuned. Well be watching.

Inaccuracy in Eaton article

Varsity's Report on "Eatonland historie" was very prompt if not quite accurate. At the September 18 meeting of the Toronto Historical Board the 188 Yonge Street (Reitman's) building indeed was added to the list of architecturally and historically significant buildings in Toronto. However, the proposal made by Douglas Richardson to add Eaton's warehouses and other Eaton buildings to the THB List was vetoed by the board.

Day of mourning to protest coup

At the Thursday meeting the executive of the Graduate Students Union called for a campus-wide day of mourning to protest the military coup in Chile. Such a day might include the lowering of all flags and the organizing of teach-ins and seminars around the question. This suggestion was later endorsed by the SAC executive and the U of T Committee for a Democratic Chile. The Committee at a Saturday meeting attended by faculty and student representatives, discussed plans for the organization of the day of mourning and activities around such questions as asylum for Chilean refugees. The meeting also decided to send a representative to the Sunday meeting of the Canadian Committee for a Democratic Chile and to work toward a later public meeting to be held on Wednesday.

Yorks scolds frats for football prank

Tradition can be a beautiful thing. It is the basis of both formal and fun activities; especially those concerning the University of Toronto. But what happens to a relatively new establishment? Where are they to start? How can you compare an institution more than half a century old with one which has just passed its first decade?

Along with tradition goes spirit. Unfortunately, there are times when spirit may drift off from the tradition it is based on and get carried away. An example of this was seen at the University of Toronto/York University football game on Saturday, September 15, at CNE Stadium.

York is young and York is vibrant, but most important of all, she is just starting to get going. When York fans set out to a football game it is to lend whatever support they can to a group of very determined young men down on the field. They trickle into the CNE (a home stadium which is anything but "home"), barely fill up a section of the stands, and they listen. They listen to Waterloo's cheerleaders, Western's marching band, U of T's Lady Godiva, and then they listen for something from York. They wait for the sound of the siren.

The sirens are York's means of support. They wait when we win, they wait when we lose, but at Saturday's game, even that was too much for the University of Toronto. May I commend the 40 some odd gentlemen of your institution who decided to apprehend the siren from the five women and three men who sat around it in the stands. The courage and sportsmanship displayed by the men of Toronto has created a fine image of U of T for those of us at York.

Perhaps the gentlemen from the University of Toronto believed that they could relieve the ladies from York of their siren without being contested in their aims. However, the young ladies and their few escorts felt that it was hardly a chivalrous affair and categorically refused to part with it. In the ensuing scuffle the gentlemen from U of T displayed the courage and determination so characteristic of their Alma Mater and retired in disgrace after losing various objects of apparel and in one instance a quantity of flesh for which Ms. Elliott profusely apologizes.

There was certainly no malice intended on the part of the ladies from York, but they really felt quite out of sorts over the whole affair. Congratulations to the members of the fraternity responsible.

Part-time degree not second -class

As a graduate of the University of Toronto under the aegis of the Division of University Extension, I was shocked to read Normal Grindal's evaluation of an "Extension degree" as reported in an article by Randy Robertson in VARSITY, September 12. The suggestion that Y of T graduates through part-time study hold second — as it must be to the Director of Extension. It does not have its basis in fact.

To begin with, such a statement defames both the academic staff of the University of Toronto and any Graduate School that accepts its students. Instruction is given almost invariably by the same professors to part-time and full-time students. Since many part-time students go on to do graduate work, it follows that the Division of Extension must set a standard that meets Graduate School entrance requirements. There is no evidence that professors and Graduate Schools prostitute courses to accommodate part-time students.

Ms. Grindal says that part-time students need a principal "who will care whether courses... are Mickey Mouse courses or courses worth working at." The inference that the Director of Extension is uncaring as to course substance, and that Mickey Mouse courses are for the asking, is false. The curriculum is well defined; Extension counselling is precise and quality-oriented. I have never known anyone to suggest light courses as an easy way. Further, I can state unequivocally, having studied both full-time and part-time at another Canadian university as well as at a major American university, that U of T courses for the part-time student demand the same criterion as that set for both types of students at other universities.

Unfortunately, there are others, the uninitiated who, like Ms. Grindal, hold the view that the price-tag on a degree won through part-time study implies second-class merchandise. The kind of talk that militates against the educational attainments of the part-time study is not only to do that student an injustice, one that may drastically affect his employment opportunities, but is also a slur on his mental integrity. I, and a good many more like me, should not have wasted our time on a second-rate course in order to obtain a second-rate degree. This is a matter I have discussed with students at length, and all agree that the quality of instruction and the standard demanded are in all ways commensurate with the full time program. "Lifelong education in a learning society should be the goal of modern man" is a fundamental recommendation of the UNESCO Report of the International Commission on the Development of education (published under the title Learning to Be: The World of Education Today and Tomorrow). We must strive constantly to improve educational programs at all levels, but we should not downgrade what currently exists, belittle students' attainments, minimize professional and administrative standards in order to build a larger edifice to Continuing Education. We who hold "Extension degrees" from the University of Toronto can be proud of the strong foundation that has been laid; it was built of good materials and no structure of the future can afford to discard it.

Abortion group turned down for $500 grant.

By KAREN KLINGER

The Women's Liberation Abortion group, operating at the U of T Advisory Bureau at Spadina and Harbord, was denied a $500 grant from Metro Council last summer.

Of all the birth control groups recommended for grants by Metro Social Services, only Planned Parenthood was awarded its request of $5,000. The main fear of Metro Council's abortion opponents was that grant money would be used by groups like the Women's Liberation Abortion group for "propaganda to liberalize the existing abortion law" rather than to operate the group's services.

While some men on Council, such as Aldermen Karl Mallette and Karl Jaffary voted for the grant, all of the women members did, and at least one woman has received hate mail for supporting this group's aims.

The Women's Liberation Abortion and Birth Control Referral Service grew out of the Toronto Women's Movement in the spring of 1970, and provided abortion referrals, at that time illegal, to Montreal from the basement of the Benson Building.

During the few years since the group's beginning, the Canadian abortion laws have been liberalized, and there has been a repeal of abortion laws in New York State.

Although it is now easier to obtain a legal abortion in Canada, this situation, according to counsellors with the abortion group, applies to the larger cities. The group receives many out-of-town calls, some as far away as Newfoundland.

As well as offering free counselling, and legal referrals on Thursday evening at the Advisory Bureau, the members also try to cut through the red tape still involved in the procedure.

The clientele of the group, according to Connie Hubbs, a counsellor with the clinic for three years, "is composed of 50 per cent single and 50 per cent married women, a number of them immigrants or women on welfare."

Hubbs says, the average age is in the mid-twenties, although an increasing proportion are of high school age.

The group also gives birth control information. "While our attitude is that abortion is a necessary back-up, the members would prefer more inquiries made about preventative birth control, and we especially invite males to use our services as they have rarely done so in the past,"

Hubbs added.

Besides counselling and referrals, the service distributes handbooks and handles speaking engagements.

At present, there are four counsellors and two trainees, one a male, in the group. Because the hoped-for grant was denied, the organization must rely on volunteers and donations.

Women increasing in Pharmacy

By BETH STEWART

The percentage of women entering the pharmacy profession has increased by leaps and bounds in the past few years, much to the initial alarm of the Ontario College of Pharmacy, the body of registered pharmacists in Ontario.

At the U of T alone, over 73 per cent of the 181 first-year Pharmacy students are women, as compared to 47 per cent of the fourth-year students.

The College of Pharmacy was afraid that women would not provide a reliable work force, because, it thought, women would be unwilling to devote themselves to their work after marriage, or would be unwilling to assume managerial positions.

However, a survey of registered women pharmacists in Ontario, conducted by Dr. Bernard Des Roches of the College of Pharmacy last June, indicates that these fears are unfounded.

Des Roches estimates that 50 per cent of the women work on a full-time basis, and that 25 per cent hold positions of authority, such as manager. "I was rather pleasantly surprised at the findings," he says. "Women contribute quite significantly to the work force."

But over 70 per cent of the women felt that better day care facilities for children would increase the likelihood of women working longer hours, and assuming more responsible positions.

With pharmacy becoming a woman-dominated field, women will be called upon to hold more managerial positions.

'Energy Policy for Canada' fails to solve real problems

By FRANCOIS BREGHA
of Participation in Energy Policy

Participation in Energy Policy (PEP) is the title of a national Opportunities for Youth Project that was centred in seven major Canadian cities during the past summer. Its purpose was to provide and encourage a citizen input into the national energy debate. This article is adapted from a position paper put out by the author and Harry Collie, Murray Randall, and John Warren.

"The State Department has often taken its policies right out of the executive suites of the oil companies. When big oil can't get what it wants in foreign countries, the State Department tries to get it for them. In many countries, the American embassies function virtually as branch offices for the oil combine..."

Jack Anderson, Washington reporter, 1967

On June 28, 1973, Donald S. Macdonald, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, tabled in the House of Commons a long-awaited document entitled An Energy Policy for Canada (Phase I). Although the report had taken two years to prepare and its release had been postponed several times, Macdonald's June 28 speech was already anticlimactic: the day before, a summary of the energy paper had been leaked to the press by Conservative MP Peter Bawden.

Indeed, the whole document and not only the speech was anticlimactic. Despite its title, "An Energy Policy for Canada" is not a policy statement. It does not indicate what measures the government will take to control or stimulate the energy sector. And it doesn't address itself to the central issue of Canadian energy policy: the all-pervasive domination of our energy sector by American interests. Throughout, the energy paper rarely rises above a bland description of the state of our energy industries.

"An Energy Policy for Canada" is also what is called in government jargon a "green paper"; that is, the presentation and analysis of several policy options. And the Green Paper indeed discusses five development options. Unfortunately, they resemble each other to such an extent as to become virtually indistinguishable. With a tenacity comparable only to that of the most self-righteous ideologues, the Green Paper refuses to challenge the fundamental assumptions underlying our present energy policies or lack of them and present meaningful alternatives.

On the contrary, the Green Paper, assumes deliberately, or perhaps unwittingly, that today's trends will carry on into tomorrow, unchanged. The Green Paper concludes, therefore, that energy prices must continue on their rapid upward spiral, that private enterprise will remain the best vehicle for the development of our energy resources, that energy demand must keep doubling every 15 years.

But, of course, this need not necessarily be so. The government can change these trends if it wants to: it can control price increase as the recent freeze on oil prices demonstrates. It can develop our energy resources better than the multinational corporations, and it can slow down the rate of growth of energy demand. All these are desirable goals. But one of the first measures needed is a clearly-articulated energy policy to implement the goals.

Rising costs of energy

If most of the Green Paper is devoted to analyses which seem remote from the interests of the average Canadian, there is at least one area which constitutes a very sensitive "bread and butter" issue: the rising costs of energy to the consumer. The report, by matter-of-factly forecasting accelerating energy price increases a more than doubling of oil and gas prices by 1990 serves to create an atmosphere of fatalism in the public mind that will serve to legitimate price increases when the "inevitably" occur. (Imperial Oil must have loved this section!)

By having isolated price, export and conservation considerations, and analyzed them separately, the Green Paper has obscured an obvious fact: Canadians need not resign themselves to mounting energy prices. Energy prices will have to increase, of course, as more expensive frontier resources are tapped. The predicted magnitude of the increase, however, amounts to an unjustifiable self-fulfilling prophecy that can easily be avoided through strong federal leadership.

Until very recently, the price of oil in Canada was determined by international factors: when the price of Middle East and American crude went up, the price of Alberta crude went up with them. Since costs of production did not increase as fast as prices were boosted up by the shortages in the United States, the difference represented pure profits for the large multinational corporations operating in Canada. This meant that Canada, an oil-sufficient country, was paying an inflated price for its own oil because the Americans were running out of cheap energy.

As the freeze on crude oil prices imposed by the federal government at the beginning of September demonstrates, there was no apparent reason why this aberrant pricing system had to continue indefinitely. Yet, the Green Paper states that "In the long run, Canadian crude prices will reflect international crude price developments".

This curious passivity in identifying the problem and then refusing to deal with it runs rampant through the whole Green Paper. The report is, more than anything else, status quo-oriented. This is most noticeable in the report's comments on energy exports.

Exports due to increase

Of the five policy options presented in the Green Paper, all of them strongly development-oriented, even the so-called "self-sufficiency option" assumes that natural gas exports will remain at their present levels and that oil exports will balance oil imports!

The high export component of our energy production is yet another factor which will lead to rising prices. Canada presently exports about 60 per cent and 50 per cent of its oil and gas production, respectively. Since Canada has only a limited stock of accessible and cheap oil and gas resources, the faster we consume these reserves, the sooner we'll have to move into the more expensive Arctic, tar sands and offshore regions and the sooner prices will have to rise. High exports therefore, mean higher prices in the long run.

Up to now Canada's maximum "export" policy has also had the unfortunate consequence of opening a serious chasm between the primary energy province, Alberta, which seems obsessed with cashing in on the American "energy crisis" and the major consuming province, Ontario, which is understandably reluctant to lucrative offers being made by the States. This situation has developed into a large scale confrontation.

Indeed, it is easy to find frontiers: Ottawa versus the Provinces over off-shore jurisdiction versus Quebec over the Borden line, Ottawa versus the two-price system for oil, etc. in the field of energy provincial-federal relations. Borden line refers to geographical line indicating Canadian oil oil is imported from Venezuela (Angola, Gulf). Oil used was shipped or piped from provinces. The line is named after the commodity which it devised it as part of Canada's energy policy.)

However, the Green Paper refuses to consider the possibility of money in energy policy and or between the provinces and government. The Green Paper avoids the realities of the situation.

"The risk of political instability conceded to be very low in of physical interruption of domestic oil" to other export emergency is also mentioned deliveries made by inland "The Oil Import Question: Relationship of Oil Imports Security". (Known as the February, 1973.)

Conservation policy

Similarly, by not presenting energy conservation policy, fails to make a complete development options. Reducing waste and increased efficiency could significantly extend our cheaper conventional sources, would delay the need to reserves in more environmentally regions.

The impact of a high rate of energy demand on the environment, on our pocketbooks, the "maximum export" policy of our easily accessible stands now, we have about supply and less than 20 years gas, at present rates of consumption.

But since consumption is year by year, those reserves are actually inflated. The time is when we will have run out of and will have to rely on exports from our "frontier" regions ahead, merely to maintain the per capita energy consumption have to invest progressively in the energy sector.

One starts to appreciate the future expenditures when one according to the Green Paper, demand for all forms of energy by the year 2000, if present trends. The Green Paper, which does not translate this in economic terms to assess the impact of rising rates of energy consumption.

There would undoubtedly be associated with a reduction in growth of energy demand: capital could be released to the economy (housing, and for example) even with a conservation program. The itself estimates that a 20 per cent in the projected levels of demand achieved by the year 2000, the government leadership, a technological innovations and a gradual change in attitudes (such as buying bottled instead of cans).

The Green Paper's status quo is abundantly clear. A thorough program of energy would clearly threaten the energy industries' "insatiable" demand. It therefore, sets out to raise the specter of a shortage of electricity, no appliances, no...Energy conservationists radicals whose efforts would soon destroy our precious standard of living.

As the report says: "A man who paddles down a quiet woodland stream "under his own power" tends to forget that he drove to the stream in a 200-horsepower car whose engine used only one-quarter its energy to move a mass of which he was only a one-fifteenth part; that he sits in an aluminum or fibreglass canoe, produced through the expenditure of considerable energy and used, perhaps, only a few hundred hours in its total lifetime....He may overlook the fact that while in the woods he left his automatic furnace or humidifier on in his house, his refrigerator running and his porch light burning. In fact, his brief return to simple nature has been accomplished and made worthwhile through the expenditure of more industrial energy than most urban or industrial activities he could have chosen".

The last falsehood presented to a gullible public is that returning to nature would not really conserve energy; the bucolic life might indeed require more power! There is no doubt that this type of distortion of the con-servationalists' arguments is very effective in preventing the public from ever considering seriously the only viable long run solution to the energy crisis.

The most serious flaw in the Green Paper is its refusal to question some of the assumptions behind today's "conventional wisdom", that growth is good, inflation inevitable, and rising energy consumption rates normal. But as was shown above, an integrated programme, incorporating pricing and export considerations and conservation policies, and recognizing the interdependence of these three factors, will break the cycle of quickly increasing prices and faster depleting resources.

Because the Green Paper never steps outside the bounds of officially-sanctioned thinking, it suffers from an unimaginative perception of the policy options open to Canada. Its conservative examination of the present energy situation, focusing on the microscopic, thereby obscuring some of the larger issues, presents a highly misleading picture and artificially constricts our range of options. The rejection of a National Petroleum Company is yet another example of this tunnel vision.

National Petroleum Company rejected

In an early draft of the Green Paper, the concept of a National Petroleum Company
(NPC) was advanced as a means to assert greater Canadian control over the petroleum industry over 90 per cent is now foreign-owned. It is interesting to note how Canada got into this unfortunate situation in the first place. According to the Green Paper, it was due to "the desire of Canadians for rapid development", a somewhat novel explanation of the sell-out of our resources!

It could be stressed that a NPC is not to be interpreted as an example of "creeping socialism". The nationalization of the oil and gas industry is an option which we must hold to be non-existent since it is nowhere mentioned in the Green Paper. There is a terse warning however that "a simplistic solution could have a seriously adverse effect on living standards in Canada".

Anyway, even the modest proposal of a NPC that was contained in the early draft was apparently too strong for Cabinet. In the best of liberal traditions, the Green Paper had to present a balanced picture. Therefore to the section outlining the advantages of a NPC was added one listing all the disadvantages. Sure enough, both sections are equal in length!

One of the major reasons given for the creation of a NPC was to capture a greater share of the economic rent, that portion of a good's value which exceeds the costs of production and normal returns to capital.
The Green Paper, itself, recognizes that "the present Canadian tax system is not designed to capture a very high percentage of the economic rent". Those of us who have heard about the "corporate welfare bums" cannot fail to agree with this statement.

"The economic infrastructure of the United States is and can be far more integrated with that of Canada than with the economy of any other country in the western hemisphere."

The Schultz Report, February, 1970

This oil rig is one method of exploring for remote reserves as world energy prices rise.

But if public ownership is out, and NPC is out, all that remains to collect that economic rent are the classic tools of taxes, royalties, etc., which in the past have always been generously counterbalanced by such goodies as capital cost allowances, depletion allowances, exploration expenses and so on.

Even here, however, the Green Paper is careful not to rock the boat and suggests caution. Although, in all fairness, the Green Paper does advocate higher taxes for the oil companies, the section on rent collection reads a bit like how-we're-being-ripped-off-and-why-we-should-keep-it-that-way. One didn't hear too many protests from the petroleum industry when the Green Paper was released. Once again, timidity masquerades as valour.

Does Macdonald see political gain?

The release of the Green Paper raises the interesting question of whether Macdonald is using it as a stepping stone to higher office. Macdonald is known to harbour political ambitions, and has already used the Green Paper to gain maximum publicity. There is evidence of a carefully orchestrated campaign designed to get Macdonald media coverage.

Copies of the Green Paper were "secretly" transported in armed Brinks trucks to Information Canada outlets. Macdonald engaged in a whirlwind tour of provincial capitals the week following the Green Paper's release.
Although the trip was supposed to gather reactions from provincial leaders, one wonders how many would have had the time to read, yet alone digest, the massive 639-page document. Macdonald also booked himself on every major television and radio public affairs show in the country; he was also available for newspaper interviews.

Although publicizing a government document is certainly commendable, Macdonald's efforts in its publicity do not fit in any kind of routine engaged in by public officials across the country. After all, when is the last time you heard about Gerard Pelletier's Green Paper?

The stakes in this exercise are loaded in Macdonald's favour. He risks little: few people will ever read the Green Paper at $10 each, few can afford it. He is known to listen extensively to the public and consult with officials. If you ever wondered what the "Phase
I" dangling at the end of the Green Paper's title stood for, it means participatory democracy. An Energy Policy for Canada (Phase II) should be ready next year after everybody's opinions will have been received.

It's too bad that given the length, the price and style of the Green Paper a glossary is thoughtfully provided at the beginning only the powerful will be able to engage in the participating. We can console ourselves though by guessing that the Green Paper will probably not count for much as far as policy-making is concerned. Just look at the recent decisions completely reversing Canada's oil policy: despite their importance, they are not even mentioned in the Green Paper.

Twatts says oil helps us

By BOB GAUTHIER

"As the source of 70 per cent of the nation's energy and a major constructive influence in the balance of payments, the long-term outlook for the oil industry is secure." So said W.O. Twatts in an article printed in 1968 The now defunct Toronto Telegram. Twatts is one of 16 provincial conservative government appointees to the Governing Council, and the chairman and chief executive officer of Imperial Oil Limited, owned by Exxon in the United States.

In the 1968 article Twatts said that 'to date, the basic policies and programs of federal and provincial authorities have, with few exceptions, been dedicated to the development of natural resources as a means of fostering high employment levels and favourable trade balances.....

"Canada's national oil policy has been favourable to the development of adequate, readily available reserves and the marketing of those reserves in the most economically advantageous markets available. The federal policy meshes with provincial energy policies also in ensuring that the oil industry and, in fact all industry, remain competitive both in the ability to produce and sell at home and abroad and in the ability to attract invest-

observance of these essential principles.
They will prove the key to ensuring that the oil industry continues its contribution to the Canadian economy."

Twatts' out-dated comments appear absurd alongside the information released in the federal government's "Green Paper" on energy policy during the summer. The 639 page report, released June 28, was called "An Energy Policy for Canada - Phase One", and dealt with the present and future energy requirements in Canada: it was prepared by the Department of Energy, Mines, and Resources.

Chile marchers cleared from Sheraton Hotel

By BARRY WEISLEDER

Over a hundred people marched Sunday under the banner of the Chilean Solidarity Committee (CSC) against the military coup that took power in Chile two weeks ago.

The demonstrators set out from Christie and Bloor at 2:30 pm, to the Four Seasons-Sheraton Hotel. The hotel is partially owned by the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, which was materially responsible for encouraging anti-Allende activity at least as far back as 1964.

There protesters denounced ITT, the CIA, and the American-inspired subversion in Chilean affairs, especially against the socialist camp.

Forming a picket line, the people circled around the entrance area to the hotel's front lobby. Upset hotel management quickly summoned police who moved the demonstrators onto the sidewalk.

During the course of the action, two brown-shirted Western Guard members were seen taking pictures and notes.

According to CSC posters advertising the march, the purpose of the action was to popularize the demand for no recognition of the military junta government and for the extension of asylum rights for political refugees.

Many of the participants, however, chanted additional slogans of solidarity with the Chilean workers' movement, calling for the ousting of the generals, and for the working class and peasantry to take power on the basis of their own independent armed strength.

In addition to numerous independents, among them several Chilean students living in Toronto, organizations like the Revolutionary Marxist Group, Red Circle, the Toronto Irish Republican Club, the League for Socialist Action, the Young Socialists, and Labor Action participated in the demonstration.

After an hour of picketing, speeches were heard from the splinter-groups represented. Before the conclusion, a CSC spokesperson announced another public rally and educational meeting to be held next Sunday to build ongoing solidarity.

Another in a series of Chile rallies was held yesterday at the Four Seasons-Sheraton Hotel, part of the IT&T conglomerate.

Scar election confusion results in new ballot

By PAUL CARSON

When is a SAC rep not a SAC rep? It seems when you are from Scarborough College and wake up to discover that your acclamation last February was illegal and next month you're going to be involved in an election that isn't really the run-of-the-mill brand of SAC election.

Sound confusing? It's better than that; it is confusing especially to the five SAC reps involved and the Scarborough Students' Council (SCSC).

The story began in March 1972 when former SAC university commissioner John Creelman, then an SCSC member, successfully amended the Scarborough constitution to require all acclamations to be ratified or rejected by the voters as part of the regular elections for the contested positions on the SCSC.

Somewhat the Scarborough election officials forgot to put the SAC acclamations on the ballot last spring and the five nominees were duly, and as it turns out illegally, declared elected.

All five reps involved John O'Donohue, Vivian Rossman, Sreela Sengupta, plus SCSC president Ross Flowers and vice-president Scott Cavalier have indicated they will remain in the race that really isn't a race.

Scarborough voters will be confronted by a somewhat lengthy ballot, since they must affirm or reject each acclamation separately but absentions are counted and write-in candidates are also permitted.

Should any of the once-acclaimed five obtain fewer affirmative votes than rejections, he or she must resign and a by-election will be held. People at SAC are suspicious of the whole thing since on the downtown campus only Victoria College has a similar election rule and no such problems have occurred at Vic.

"There's nothing underhanded going on," Flowers said yesterday. "We know it's a confusing situation, but we have no choice but to uphold our constitution no matter what SAC thinks."

The acclamations that aren't will be finally settled on October 3, the same day as Scarborough's regular fall elections to fill vacancies on its local Council.

But even that is not as simple as it might appear, since the SCSC Constitution provides for a series of "year reps" and under the new credit system, there no longer are any "years" in the traditional or constitutional sense.

Moreover, the Council also includes part-time students for the first time and one vice-president and four reps must be elected from among those students, but again under the credit system, there no longer are any traditional "part-time" students as they are usually classified on the downtown campus.

The problem was resolved by terming any student taking less than four courses as "part-time" and by basing the "year reps" on the total number of courses a student has successfully completed.

Thus, there are two vacancies for students in their first year at Scarborough and taking four courses or more in the 1973-74 academic year, one vacancy for students who have completed five courses but less than ten courses and are enrolled in four or more this year, plus the one vice-presidency and four other positions open to students taking less than four courses this year.

Not surprisingly, given the confusion there are not many nominees so far and the deadline is this Friday at 10 pm.

Amid all the uncertainty, one fact is perfectly clear: on October 4 Scarborough will have five legally elected SAC reps. Maybe.

Oh yes, John Creelman, the man who inadvertently started it all back in March '72, is not a candidate.

Students seek asylum

OTTAWA (Cup) — Chilean students in Canada asked the Canadian government yesterday to withhold recognition from Chile's military junta, to grant asylum to persons escaping the junta's rule, and to ask the United Nations to establish a presence in Chile.

The students and supporters from the Anglican, United, and Roman Catholic churches and the Canadian Labor Congress presented their requests to External Affairs officials and MP's.

While some were talking to government officials, a small group of supporters marched on Parliament hill with signs and denouncing the anti-democratic coup and American government and CIA involvement.

The students said they "have no doubt the CIA participated in the coup." They say Chile's long democratic tradition and Allende's popularity among Chileans will preclude any acquiescence to a military dictatorship. Many Allende supporters will now go underground, they predict.

Some Chileans living in Canada have telephoned their families, but "people are even afraid to talk on the phone", so they haven't learned much about the current situation in Chile.

There are about 5,000 Brazilians and about 6,000 other political exiles now living in Chile. Most of these people immigrated to Chile after Allende's election victory and they face imprisonment or death if they are deported by the junta. The students say the junta is using these people as scapegoats for the coup by saying they are foreign terrorists who were welcomed by Allende.

Law clinic solves immigration, divorce problems

By ELAINE KAHN
"It's just extraordinary — people just don't like their names," Rob Pritchard, director of the Campus Legal Assistance Centre, told the Varsity Saturday.

Pritchard said 55 people last year came to the centre for help in changing their names, a process which can cost up to $65.

"Every time someone comes in for it, it amazes me," the second-year law student said. "We help them through the whole process."

Pritchard is one of four law students in charge of the University of Toronto's Legal Aid Society, which is authorized by the Ontario Legal Aid Act. Law professor Desmond Morton is faculty advisor to the project, now in its sixth year.

For the past three years, the society has been a year-round operation, financed through the summer by Opportunities For Youth grants. The society's main base is the clinic at 44 St. George Street, but it also operates 16 community clinics in the city and the York County referral system — which handles cases sent directly to them by Ontario Legal Aid.

Over a third of U of T's law students are involved with the programme, Pritchard said. Sixty-five of them, mainly from second year, man the main clinic in two-hour shifts Monday through Friday from 10 am to 6 pm.

The volunteers' work doesn't end when the shift does, however, because the person who takes on a case is expected to follow it through, even as far as the courts.

"So there's no need to make appointments ahead of time," Pritchard said.

A client only has to switch lawyers if a specialist in the area is needed or if the lawyer he got feels nervous about going to court and wants a more experienced student to back him up.

First year students sit in as observers for a while when they begin.

"A first year student is never there by himself," Pritchard said. "We're concerned for the quality of the service. We don't want the student lawyers guinea-pigging students, getting experience at their expense."

Three lawyers — not members of the law faculty — act as a review board for the centre, giving the volunteers advice when they hit problems. Also, all cases that are going to court and all documents being drafted must come before the review board, Pritchard said.

Pritchard said clinics are referred to lawyers or legal aid, if the case involved is beyond the competence of the volunteer students.

There are also legal restrictions on the clinic's operations. The students can handle only summary cases in small claims courts (offences up to $400, including vagrancy and offences against the LCBO Act), or cases in which the judge elects to go summary — for example, Pritchard said, most drug possession cases.

Indictable criminal offences are beyond the clinic's jurisdiction.

"We can't do divorces, but we can give them all the advice on how to go about it," Pritchard said. "We see a lot of family problems."

He said marriage separation problems are very common among graduate students. Separation affects their student loan status, and the clinic saves these students money by swearing affidavits for them, certifying that they are indeed separated.

The student lawyers can also represent clients before groups like the Workmen's Compensation Board and the Immigration Appeals Board.

"Immigration has become a rather special field," Pritchard said, and the society has prepared a six-page booklet to help students deal with immigration cases. "Sometimes we'll help a client apply for legal aid," Pritchard said. "It's a somewhat intimidating experience going down there sometimes."

The clinic handles 35 to 100 cases a week, "a gigantic number," Pritchard said. Many of the cases involve landlord-tenant disputes and lately a lot of clients have needed help with charges of disturbing the peace.

Also, Pritchard said, "There are so many drug offences on this campus and people don't take it seriously."

He said many recent drug offences are four cultivating marijuana, an increasingly popular hobby, apparently, which carries a more serious penalty than possession.

Pritchard said one of the clinic's more interesting cases over the summer involved a phone call from a man who said police had just called, asking him to come to court to give evidence in a case against a 14-year-old girl he'd been living with.

She had run away from home, began living with him and then was found by her parents, who took her back and were trying to put her away in a training school.

Pritchard said there is a law allowing parents to do this if their child is "completely uncontrollable."

Pritchard said the man would have been "digging his own grave" if he'd gone down to testify because admitting that he had slept with a 14-year-old girl, knowing that she was 14, "rapidly becomes rape."

The clinic — which has a yearly operating cost of $15,000 to $16,000 — has "serious financial problems" and is trying to get money from the Students' Administrative Council, Pritchard said.

Last year, SAC gave the clinic $5,000 and it got $1,000 from the Graduate Students' Union. The federal and provincial governments also help out, but Pritchard is afraid they'll stop, because services are going mainly to students and not to the general community.

Quebec dailies go

*MONTREAL (CUP-QUEBEC PRESSE) — In the three years between 1969 and 1973, the number of independent daily news papers in Quebec has dropped from six to two and their circulation gone from 572,000 to about 50,000.

In relative terms, the proportion of circulation of the independents to the large chains has dropped from 51 to four per cent.

Informed sources in Quebec say that Power Corporation is about to acquire Le Soleil and Le Quotidien, a Saguenay daily.

This will give it control of 650,000 of the 1,200,000 newspapers circulated in Quebec each day.

Power Corporation is a large Quebec-based holding company. It has substantial holdings in resource extraction companies and utility companies. The directors have very close ties with both the federal and Quebec Liberal parties and their latest acquisition will probably reflect it.

The two dailies which can currently be considered independent are Le Devoir and the Sherbrooke Daily Record. Le Devoir has 40,000 readers in Montreal and the Daily Record runs about 8,800.

The rest of the papers are owned by Southern News Peladeau, and F.P. Publications.

F.P. Publications, a Toronto-based group, controls newspapers in Canada with a total circulation of over one million readers.

Police end worker occupation at French factory

BESANCON, France (Cup-Lns) — "It can be done - We are producing and selling. (signed) the Workers" read a banner that hung on the fence at the entrance to the Lip watch factory until August 14. For two months, the 1,320 workers here had occupied the factory after they learned that the company had planned to restructure, cut back on production and fire between 250-350 workers.

The occupation had drawn wide support from other workers all over France. There were rallies and messages of solidarity. Hundreds of workers in delegations from factories all over France and other parts of Europe travelled to Lip to both deliver contributions and to buy watches.

"Do not send us money," said a statement from the Lip workers. "We don't need it for the moment. But we have watches to sell. Buying them will help us because it also gives a political shade to your support."

Thirty bus loads of three thousand national policemen moved in at 6 am on August 14 and evicted the 50 people who were on guard that night. The choice of that date was no accident. Most of the working population in France has a month long vacation from the end of July to the end of August. August 15 is also Assumption Day - a religious holiday widely observed in France.

But even so, 10,000 people demonstrated outside the Lip plant after the eviction. Municipal employees and transportation workers and other workers in Besancon, a city of 140,000 declared strikes in sympathy with the Lip workers. Trains stopped running at important stations for an hour as railway workers struck in solidarity in other parts of France. Technicians and journalists at the state owned radio and television stations struck for one day on August 23.

And vacation or no, thousands of people gathered in Paris August 16 to support the Lip people. Charles Piaget, the CFDT union shop steward at Lip, told the crowd that the eviction was not decisive. "The police only occupy the walls. They cannot make the factory go. We, the workers, are the real factory."

Ebauches has been facing competition from American and Japanese watches. Last April it announced plans for restructuring and the layoffs at Lip to make itself more profitable.

The two unions at the plant, the CFDT and the CGT, called general assemblies to discuss what to do. Work stoppages and slow downs were conducted.

Demanding that there be no layoffs or closing out of sections of the plant, the workers distributed leaflets at the entrances to the city explaining their position to other Besanconians. April 26, nearly the whole plant demonstrated outside the prefecture (city hall). Five thousand people attended a rally May 10th in Besancon in support of the workers.

Then on June 12th, the administrators of the factory announced that the company was applying for bankruptcy and the workers would receive neither their salaries nor their vacation pay (with vacation to start July 29th).

With that announcement, workers held two managers of the factory in their office while they searched their offices to find out more about the company's plans. Going through the files they found plans to lay off nearly half of the Lip work force starting June 15th and ending in August.

At the factory late that night, several hundred police moved in and released the two managers. Several workers were injured in the assault.

The next day, the Lip workers voted for an unlimited occupation of the factory "to safeguard our tools". They demanded guaranteed jobs, continued payments of wages and staggering of vacations. They say that if they were all to take vacations at the same time, the company might try to lock them out.

On June 15th there was a demonstration in support of the workers in which 15,000 people participated, the largest in the city since its liberation from the Nazis in 1945.

In the factory itself, the atmosphere was relaxed. Gone was the electric device which set the speed that the watches were to be produced. Instead, the workers decided how many watches they could produce and worked at that speed. Lunch of sandwiches, fruit and drinks were provided at a very small fee.

The workers say they intend to continue their "wildcat" watchmaking from outside the factory and continue selling the watches. Every worker took his tool kits with him. Questioned about possible legal action that might be taken against them, one worker said, "All that has been done by 1,000 people. It is no use hiring other workers and taking legal proceedings against us. Lip can't function without us."

Queens to leave OFS?

Kingston (Cup)— Certain members of the Queens University Student Union the External Affairs Commissioner among them, are advocating that Queens leave the Ontario Federation of Students.

External Affairs commissioner Kiloran German told the Journal that while Queen's contributes over $2,000 annually to the OFS coffers, the students receive almost nothing worthwhile in return. She felt that Queen's would be better off if they were to opt out of the OFS and act independently or in cooperation with other universities as it suits the students best interest.

German has drawn up a proposal for opting out of the OFS which will be put before the next meeting of the Student Union on Wednesday night. It has been seconded by the Vice-President of the Student Union.

German gave three main reasons for her decision. First, of OFS debates often become sidetracked from educational issues to politics and irrelevant issues, and as a result the issues become clouded.

Second, she claims that OFS delegates tend to be unrepresentative of their home campuses. The third problem is that the distance between Ontario campuses makes it difficult to hold frequent OFS meetings. In addition, the necessary ratification of OFS motions by each campus makes fast decisive action impossible.

All in all, these people believe that there are better solutions to the problems of students at Queen's who feel that the university should remain in the OFS. There are two people at Queen's who are on the OFS executive. There will be further discussion and a vote on the issue at the Wednesday night meeting.

Kraft ban spreads

Edmonton (Cup)

The Edmonton Boycott Kraft Committee recently presented a submission requesting that the Alberta government officially back the boycott.

The boycott was instituted several years ago by the National Farmer's Union to force Kraft into collective bargaining with dairy farmers. At present Kraft is one of the largest milk users in many areas of Canada, and the farmers, in order to find a market, must sell to Kraft at prices the corporation dictates.

The NEU points out Kraft pays far too little and that only through collective bargaining can the farmers get a fair price.

The Edmonton committee asked that the Alberta government refuse to use Kraft products in its buildings and cafeterias and officially support the boycott.

Their argument was that the government should put the interest of consumers and workers before the interests of private corporations.

Then it was the government's turn. Hugh Horner, Alberta Minister of Agriculture led off.

Horner said "We are already overregulated and that more regulations would create more problems for the little guy."

How this applied to the boycotting of a corporation that made a $91-million net profit in 1971 was not clear.

His second argument was that if the government regulated corporations it would also have to regulate wages which is in fact a recommendation of his own conservative party in their fight against inflation.

Horner also said that the government's development loans had helped start 5 cheese processing plants, enough he suggested, to compete against any large monopoly attempting to entrench in Alberta.

The committee did not question Mr. Horner's judgement but they did point out that Kraft is also in control of large areas of merchandising and advertising, which also effect the marketing of products.

Mr. Horner accused the committee of being "negative" and left the meeting.

When the boycott committee asked the remaining representatives to address the demand, Bob Dowling, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, said that Horner had "indirectly talked about it directly".

Dowling went on to say that the answer to the problem lay in the government's subsidizing of processors and producers.

Fred Peacock, the final member of the government committee, was against the boycott on principle.

Mr. Peacock is Alberta Minister of Industry and Commerce.

The government representatives never discussed the idea of giving verbal support to the boycott.

The government will continue to subsidize processors and Canadian farmers will continue to move to the cities at a rate of 1,000 a month. But there is some consolation in the words of one government representative.

"I don't eat Kraft. I eat Black Diamond. Kraft tastes like soap."

Rugby Blues open season, slam Trent 38-4

By JAMES MacDONALD

The Rugby Blues first xv opened their league schedule with a 38-4 win at Trent on Saturday. The game was high-lighted by the ball-winning ability of the forwards in the scrums, line-outs and in the loose while the wings and centres demonstrated powerful running.

The scoring opened early as Neil Sorbie gathered in an up and under from Ian Lindsay inside the Trent 25 and lunged in for an unconverted try. Shortly thereafter newcomer Peter Moore on the wing scored again from a Lindsay up and under. Bruce Carroll converted to make it 10-0 for Toronto.

Before the half ended Paul Kitchen dove in for the first of his three tries to give the Blues a 14-0 lead.

Trent started the second half by kicking to the Blues forwards. This began what was probably the finest rugby of the afternoon. Randy Filinski took the ball in cleanly and was quickly given balanced support by the rest of the pack. As soon as the Trent forwards were committed to the ruck the ball was put out on the Blues backs and to Carroll out on the wing.

As he sprinted down the touch-line, Carroll passed the ball inside to Rodger Wright who, after having drawn in the last defender passed off to Bruce Weygood who went in between the posts alone for the try. Carroll converted to make it 20-0 for the Blues.

At this point Toronto backed off a bit and the Trent forwards, quick to capitalize, broke through a line-out near the goal-line for four points.

Within minutes centre Wright struck back for the Blues as he scored two more tries, the first after a magnificent full-speed catch of a Lindsay up and under kick. As the final half drew to a close, Kitchen added eight more to Toronto's score on two more tries.

The first came after a powerful side-line run, while the second was in the corner after fly-half Lindsay moved to the weak side from a five yard scrum. Carroll added a third conversion to make the final score 38-4 Toronto.

The game represented a splendid beginning to the Blues '73 season and demonstrated why they'll be strong contenders for the championship this year.

The pack in particular looks very strong with veterans Amborski and Algicas Props, Brian Smith in second row, and Mike Code at number 8. Newcomers in the forwards include Mike Hall as hooker and Randy Filinski in second row, both of whom look more than promising.

On Sunday in a scrappy and wet game the second fifteen were unfortunate to lose 3-0 to an experienced but heavy Toronto Saracens team. The Blues showed a lack of co-ordination in the pack and the backs had little to demonstrate in the way of passing skill.

As soon as the non-league game started a brief rain shower further deteriorated the already wet conditions on the back field. However, the Blues went on the attack immediately as the Saracen full-back fumbled a deep kick into the end zone. Quick-thinking Tom Bell was unfortunate not to score as he ran in but was just beaten to the ball. Not set back by this, the Blues again went on the attack and a quick kick into the Saracen's end-zone gave several Toronto players the chance to score but hesitation and a slippery ball denied them the four points.

At this time the Saracens drove down field and kept the Blues hemmed in their own half for most of the rest of the half with the help of numerous offences by university players.

However the Saracens were unable to capitalize on any of these opportunities and a tenacious Toronto team held on to the half-time whistle.

In the second half the Saracens quickly went on the offensive and gained 3 points from a 20 yard penalty kick by Mike Matthews. This appeared to demoralize the Blues badly and they showed little in the way of serious threats for much of the rest of the half.

With ten minutes to go they once again came to life when aggressive Brian Prettie broke from the goal-line on a strong run to centre-field. From a line-out here the Blues bulldozed their way down to the Saracen 25.

For the rest of the game the Toronto team appeared to be on the verge of scoring, yet a strong display of side-line kicking by their opposition and a wet, muddy ball pushed them back again and again from the necessary four points.

Much of the game appeared to be a rough game of soccer as players kicked the ball back and forth. The conditions certainly were not conducive to a passing game.

However, there were several

stand-outs on the Blues as Bell demonstrated some strong tackling and Prettie some aggressive running as well good line-out work. On the whole the team was enthusiastic and had the individual talents yet could never put it all together.

This may be attributed to the fact that they had never played together before, even in practice, which must be rectified if they are to be a strong team this year.

This Wednesday both teams travel to R.M.C. in Kingston.

Injuries strike too often

By PAUL HOCH

A recent study has revealed the shocking fact that one of every two boys playing high school football suffers an injury and that half of these injuries are preventable under proper, skilled supervision.

Yet of the nearly 15,000 high schools in the U.S. with football programs, involving more than 800, 000 young athletes, only about 100 have fulltime trainers.

In Washington, D.C., for example, one high school athletic director reports that: "Many times here in the District you have coaches and athletic directors trying to treat broken legs and separated shoulders. There aren't any provisions for trainers; the finances won't allow it."

The only time doctors are available is for a game, and many times they don't show up."

There is an average of 21 football deaths in high schools and colleges each year. In addition, there are an estimated 40,000 knee injuries that require surgery every year, as well as tens of thousands of minor injuries that do not require surgery.

When Bill Arnold, a University of North Carolina sophomore guard, died last year of heat stroke suffered in football practice, 11 former UNC players issued a statement charging the school with failing to provide "adequate preventive measures" which might have saved his life.

A faculty committee, appointed to investigate the circumstances surrounding Arnold's death, declared that UNC's football program was little different from those of most colleges and universities in the U.S.

One of the major excuses for the inadequacies, which most school officials and doctors are willing at least to admit, is that there simply isn't enough money to hire additional trainers and doctors. Also, it is said, there simply wouldn't be enough doctors to go around if a rule were made requiring the presence of a doctor and an ambulance at each high school football game.

In the Soviet Union, where every one of the millions of secondary school children regularly engages in supervised sports activities, the government has seen to it that none do so without the supervision and presence of doctors and trainers.

This is the US scene that Hoch is talking about. How close is U of T to the picture he presents of American schools? On Wednesday Varsity looks at this campus.

Golden Gaels outkick Toronto for 27-9 win

By PAUL CARSON

The foot came back into football Saturday afternoon in Kingston as Queens Golden Gaels outkicked and outplayed the football Blues 27-9 amid the rain and mud of George Richardson Stadium.

The loss was Blues' first in three OUAA games but even with a 2-1 record they must defeat both Queens and Ottawa in order to advance into the post-season playoffs. The win evened Queens' record at 1-1 following their opening day loss to Ottawa.

Blues' traditional inability to maintain early leads in Kingston repeated itself again as quarterback Wayne Dunkley scored an early touchdown with kicker Donny Thompson adding the convert and a single to give Varsity an 8-0 first quarter lead.

However, apart from another Thomson single off a wide field goal attempt, that was it for the Varsity offense.

Queens' powerful running attack went to work and Blues were simply unable to stop it. The home team continually enjoyed good field position and Gaels' kicker John Wintermeyer made the best of it, connecting on four long field goals from 33, 37, 42 and final 34 yards.

Dunkley couldn't pass in the driving rain and finished the day with only one solitary completion an all-time career low for the same quarterback who passed Queens silly on the same field last season.

Blues were known to be weak in the offensive line before the current season began, but coach Ron Murphy refused to blame the rookie linemen for the loss.

"We blocked fairly well", Murphy said yesterday, "but Queens stacked their defense to stop our running and our linemen could only block so many people. They always had one linebacker free to make the tackle."

Varsity's defensive unit played well for the third consecutive time and Blues were still very much in the game until Darrell Penner romped 50-yards for a third quarter touchdown following a Varsity fumble. Wintermeyer kept kicking those long field goals and finally old nemesis Stu Lang iced the game with a 10-yard touchdown run late in the fourth quarter.

"Bright sports for Blues were the improving pass coverage from the rookie-laden defensive secondary and persistent attempts of freshman running back Bob Hedges and Steve Kwiatkowski to develop some resemblance of a ground game in the deep mud.

Fortunately, Blues suffered only one minor injury from the game, a hip pointer to flanker Brent Elsey. "You might say the only thing seriously hurt is our pride," Murphy commented.

Windsor Lancers, who provide the opposition for Blues' home opener this weekend at the Stadium, took advantage of Guelph penalties and fumbles to edge the Gryphons 21-15 in Guelph.

Varsity quarterback Wayne Dunkley sneaks in for touchdown giving Blues short-lived first quarter lead.

Lancers had a tremendous passing attack in 1972 but their all-star quarterback Andy Parisi has graduated and this season they are relying on a sturdy defence plus an opportunistic offense.

Lancers grabbed a 19-14 halftime lead thanks to several pass interceptions and over 100 yards in penalties assessed to Guelph who ran the ball effectively but just couldn't finish off their drives.

Gryphons pulled one of the stranger plays in recent OUAA seasons in the game's final minute when faced with a third down and ten play on their own 45 yard line. Instead of trying to pass or run for the crucial first down, Gryphons inexplicably conceded a safety touch and were forced to then kickoff from their own twenty-five.

In other games, Western blasted Waterloo 42-13.

Gryphons snatch 1-1 tie from soccer Blues

By JOHN COBBY

The Guelph Gryphons soccer club left Varsity Stadium on Saturday delighted to have snatched a 1-1 tie from a troubled Blues team. Despite positional and personnel changes the Toronto squad was again unable to turn its decided territorial advantage into goals.

From the opening whistle Blues moved forward in a business-like manner, determined to score an early goal. Alann Caramancio, operating down the left wing, consistently outran the opposing fullback, and so much of the play was directed into his path. Both Vince Ierullo and Elvy Zanette as front runners were winning their share of the ball, the former by his busy efforts, the latter by his size.

After 10 minutes these three forwards combined in a crisply-executed move. Caramancio passed to Zanette, who crossed a low ball to the far right post. Ierullo was just able to meet it, but diverted it fractionally wide.

The aggressive Toronto play forced the Gryphons into a defensive posture. Their response was limited to counterattack rather than sustained pressure of their own. This attacking pattern left the Guelph forwards plenty of space in the Toronto zone, but they were unable to create any dangerous threats.

At the 30 minute mark Blues took the lead with a well-constructed goal. Tim Burns and Hillier inter-passed the ball down the right side and across the face of the packed defence. Hillier released an incisive through pass to Ierullo in a gap left by a defender drawn out of position. Ierullo drove the ball wide of goalkeeper Sinanan into the net for Blues first goal in four games.

The lead was well-deserved on the run of play and climaxed an opening half-hour of forceful and skilful effort by the team. However, they could enjoy their lead for only five minutes before disaster struck.

A free kick by the Gryphons 25 yards directly in front of goal was deflected wide of the goal by one of the packed Blues defenders. Goalie Jack Brand, realizing that the spinning ball would cross the byline, darted from his net to prevent conceding a corner kick to Guelph.

Instead of smothering the ball, he let it slip from his grasp and roll toward the goal. The grateful Guelph forwards then needed only to push the ball into the net, with Pablo Leslie applying the final touch.

Despite this setback Blues continued to play their improved brand of soccer. Almost immediately Burns hit a well-placed shot into the visitor's goal, only to have his score cancelled by a questionable offside call.

When play recommenced after the half the Toronto team again forced the play, but with less precision than before. Most of the action now revolved around the strong front running of an Slimmon moved upfield in an attempt to win back the lead.

Goalworthy attempts from Ierullo, Crewe, and Hillier went fractionally wide or were snared by the quick hands of goalie Sinanan. Blues maintained the pressure for most of the half, but the determined Gryphons held firm.

The visitors' zeal was nearly their undoing, for with 15 minutes left to play, they could only stop Burns with some rugged tackling near the bounds of legality. The pleas for a penalty delivered by the Blues captain from his prostrate position were turned down by the referee, to the relief and surprise of the Gryphons.

The Blues attempts to score became generally more frenetic and disorganized as frustration crept in. Ian Slimmon broke through two defenders only to shoot into the goalkeeper's feet. Little in the way of coherent attack developed and the game ended without further excitement.

Following the game, coach Bob Nicol commented, "We still have the same problem of lack of leadership up front."

Next Wednesday the team travels to Brock, hoping to translate good midfield play and pressure into some goals. The game is a must if Blues are to make the play-offs.

Guelph goalkeeper Sinanan takes to the air but he could have stayed home — the shot missed the mark.

sportalk

Paul Hoch to the contrary, the Blues don't seem to be doing too badly this year for injuries. Brent Elsey, the fleet flanker, received a minor hip injury on Saturday and is a doubtful starter in the home opener against Windsor Ian Harris, soccer Blues midfielder, pulled a groin muscle in the exhibition tournament in Hartwick, and is probably lost for the season.

Blues soccer team scoring plight seems to be endemic in Toronto. Fans will remember that Metros were unable to solve the problem for several years, until an Irish airlift produced Terry Harkin of Finn Harps. They went on to win the division. Perhaps coach Bob Nicol should try a bicycle lift from St. Mike's?

Blues hockey team could have its problems this year, with both first string goalies gone — Durno to the five-year plan, and Inness to the WHA. On the plus side, two first-string and two second-string defenders are back.

Hermant loves Eaton Centre

Governing Council member Sydney Hermant indirectly owns this building at 21 Dundas Square just around the corner from where the new Eaton Centre is supposed to go up. Paja Realty, owned by Hermant's family, officially owns the building, the home of Imperial Optical Co. Ltd., and its various holding companies.

Located just up Yonge Street and around the corner from the University of Toronto's controversial property 188 Yonge Street, the Hermant Building was one of the first structures in Toronto to be fireproofed.

The Eaton Centre family together with Fairview Corporation is developing the land within a stone's throw of the Hermant's Building, from Dundas to Queen Street and along Yonge to Bay Street.

Fairview is now attempting to purchase the last piece of available property it needs on Yonge Street - 188 Yonge. The property was willed to the University of Toronto in 1922 by Naomi Bilton on the condition that the university would not sell it to Eaton's.

At last week's Governing Council meeting Hermant said that "if the university decided not to sell the property (188 Yonge) it would be standing in the way of the greatest development in the centre of a city on the North American continent..." He did not think there was any moral issue since one cannot bind the use of land indefinitely. (According to the U of T administration paper, the Bulletin). Hermant said the action is perfectly sound, acceptable, legal, and constructive.

The City Commissioner of Real Estate estimated land values in the area to be about $52.15 a square foot. Even though land prices are already high, the Eaton-Fairview development, inflation, demand, and a new look for downtown will undoubtedly force prices up higher.

When the prices do go up with the new construction, the strategic location of the Hermant Building will likely mean an increase in its property value also.

This "leaning tower of Toronto" is in reality the Herman Building. Big deal, you say? Yes, and the big deal is the Centre, which works out just fine for Governing Council member Sydney Hermant.

No contest in UTAA

George Woodhouse, director of the university health service was yesterday once again "elected" president of the University of the University of Toronto Athletic Association (men) for the 1973-74 academic year. Woodhouse defeated student member Bruce Durno 10-4 in a no-contest election. Durno then went on to be elected vice-president of the UTAA by unanimous consent.

Only last week intramural director Dave Copp said he had heard that Woodhouse "wanted out", but his election yesterday seemed to deny this report.

The UTAA is composed of 20 members including seven students. Durno only received support from four of them yesterday.

Woodhouse has a reputation as the president's man (John Evans, that is) and there will not likely be any internally generated changes in the directorate as long as he remains president.

Although there was an attempt to bar the Students' Administrative Council's interim representative from the meeting until after the vote for president had taken place, the members finally agreed that the representative could vote.

But precedent was also broken yesterday with the appointment of Ann Hewett, director of women's athletics, to the UTAA Directorate. Appointed by president John Evans Hewett is the first woman to be permitted to sit on the directorate in its 80 year history.

Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway arrived just as the meeting had completed all the items on the agenda to explain the report of the task force on athletics — a report developed over the summer without broad-based student consultation. Conway continually emphasized that the report was only a working document and it would come before the Internal Affairs Committee for discussion next month "where students will have a chance to participate". There are eight students on the Governing Council out of a total of 50 members.

Not one student was a signor of the task force report. The report deals in part with building usage and allocation of facilities and was chiefly prepared by Brian Levitt, former assistant to vice-president and provost Don Forster. Levitt received help from Bruce Kidd, professor in the School of Physical and Health Education this year.

Feasibility studies for building allocation were prepared by the administration even though the administration has not contributed any money toward the construction costs of men's athletic facilities on the St. George Campus.

The arena and stadium facilities were constructed at a cost of over $1 million with a loan borrowed at an interest rate from the U of T administration by the old Board of Governors (forerunner to the Governing Council). The debt was largely repaid through gate receipts collected from students and community groups for attendance at student hockey and football games.

Last year students contributed over 50 per cent of the operating budget of the UTAA, but are restricted by the terms of the constitution to seven members on the 20 member directorate.

In the past the administration has made profits from the rental of the facilities to outside groups, the most recent being a contract with the Toronto Toros of the WHA for the 1973-74 hockey season. This transaction was removed from the UTAA office and handled directly through vice-president (business affairs) Alex Rankin's office during the summer.

Anderson cans Forster report

By BOB BETTSON

The Task Force Report on Academic Appointments that recommended no student representation in staffing decisions has come under heavy fire in a proposed SAC response drafted by an ad-hoc committee but not yet approved by the council.

SAC President Bob Anderson said in an interview yesterday that the Task Force, headed by Vice-president and Provost Don Forster had failed to deal with the question of student representation, the nature of tenure and periodic review, the relationship between discipline and academic appointments, and the problems of evaluating teaching.

Concluding that "the Forster report is an inadequate basis for the development of future policy on academic appointments," the draft response places heavy emphasis on the importance of student involvement in staffing decisions and the use of student course evaluations to evaluate teaching ability.

Anderson said that the report's stand on student representation is "unacceptable." He countered its contention that there is no acceptable way to choose students to serve on staffing committees with a suggestion that elected departmental assemblies be set up and students and faculty would each elect representatives to sit on staffing committees.

He maintained that selection would not have to be uniform across the university, as the Forster report contended, and that methods could be adapted to the department or division involved.

The response also states that teaching ability must become a major factor in hiring, firing, promotion and tenure decisions and supports centrally designed and administered course evaluations as a major element in decision-making.

Anderson said that questionnaires could be drawn up by student organizations with some faculty input. He added that open-ended and specific questions could be added in each individual department.

The student brief cites a report of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations which concluded that student evaluations are reliable. In the past faculty members have often criticized them as highly subjective and irrational.

Anderson argued that the Forster report did not deal with the issue of the relative importance of teaching and research in staffing decisions. He maintained that, in past decisions, the major factor has been the quality of research, not teaching ability.

The response also rejects the Forster report's lack of consideration given to periodic review of tenured faculty. Anderson said that while tenure should be given "as some indication that continued appointment should be granted", there should be a regular review "to determine continuing quality."

The SAC response also criticizes the task force for failing to relate dismissal procedures for "gross misconduct" to the new discipline code.

"In such cases the discipline structures adopted in principle by the Governing Council must apply, not the hearing procedures in the Haist rules," (adopted by U of T in 1967).

Anderson views student representation on staffing committees as more important than present involvement on other university decision-making bodies. He has unsuccessfully called on U of T president John Evans to set up a committee with staff-student parity to explore how students could be chosen for committees.

The question of student representation will be the key issue in an October SAC referendum. Anderson said that a SAC ad-hoc steering committee on the staffing issue has recommended that last week's council decision to ask students if they favoured student-non-student parity on staffing committees be reversed. This decision would mean that students would have exactly half of all seats on staffing committees.

The SAC steering committee, however, wants the referendum question to be about staff-student parity, which would give students and faculty an equal voice.

Anderson argued that a campaign for staff-student parity is "more defensible," and support for student non-student parity "suggests that everyone else is exactly the same as faculty and can't be trusted to take a different view."

The steering committee is co-ordinating a campaign to inform students about the staffing issue before the referendum. It is composed of members from all segments of the student community and is conducting an all-out effort to publicize the issues involved through literature tables, leafleting, speaking to classes and holding meetings to discuss the issue.

Anderson said that the Governing Council and its committees could not ignore demands for student representation "if we get the mandate we hope to get."

He anticipates that student representation on staffing committees would "have a major effect on the way decisions are made."

At the present time the chairman of the department and senior faculty have most of the decision-making power.

Housing inspector has list of repairs

Business Affairs passes renovations to Innis

At least one house on Sussex St. owned by the university but managed by Crown Trust, has been allowed to deteriorate without regard to tenant safety.

In June, a slate from the roof of the building at 8 Sussex St. fell, hitting a tenant, who was not injured.

Since then, a city housing inspector at the request of the tenants, compiled an extensive list of repairs required on the one residence which was sent to the university and passed to Crown Trust. The university was given 30 days to complete major repairs and 60 days to finish the minor ones.

According to Randy Grimes, administrative assistant in the office of Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin, the major repairs are still "being taken care of," 25 days after the deadline. The housing inspector was not available for comment as to possible legal measures against the university.

Grimes said it would be "useless" for the university to spend money for the minor repairs necessary on 8 Sussex, as it is soon to be turned over to Innis College for their residence plan.

Innis is in the process of completing a Central Mortgage and Housing Corp. loan to renovate the houses on the street, one of which is the site of the Campus Co-op Day Care Center for under-tuos, and another the possible future site of the over-two day-care center that now illegally occupies the meteorological building on Devonshire Place.

For the present, the university does not want to spend money on houses that are soon to be renovated, although the situation appears to warrant prompt action.

According to Klaus Rocich, a member of the Huron-Sussex Ratepayers Association, the building inspector "almost condemned" the house.

Crown Trust has come into other problems recently with tenants in the area, due to quick evictions by one of their managers of tenants at 4 Sussex St. and general complaints from tenants of undue rent increases. U of T Governing Council, two members of which James Joyce and W.J.D. Lewis, are also directors of Crown Trust, is presently looking into the problem of rent in the surrounding campus area.

This house above (the one behind the trees) on Sussex Street is owned by U of T and managed by Crown Trust. It has been allowed to deteriorate so much that part of it fell, hitting a tenant.

Cops and courts combine to suppress pickets

Police have stepped up attacks on picketers at the Artistic Woodwork plant in North York according to strike supporters.

Five more arrests were made on Monday. Two of those charged, U of T lecturer Mark Golden and York student Ray VanVnooch, are being held in Don Jail after refusing to sign papers that they would not come within 150 feet of the Densley avenue plant.

Supporters are appealing the bail conditions to Ontario Attorney General Dalton Bales. The others arrested were turned loose without this condition because it was their first arrest.

According to strike supporter John Lang the effect of the arrests is to allow the company to suppress picketing without getting an injunction. He added that the company probably couldn't get an injunction because of the lack of damage to the plant.

"The police and the courts are imposing conditions worse than an injunction without the union being able to contest their actions", he stated.

Strikers and their supporters have also started to picket at the Don Jail and the court building at Keele and Lawrence protesting the treatment of Golden and VanVnooch.

They are continuing to picket at the Artistic plant every morning between 6 and 8 am. It is located at 23 and 25 Densley Avenue near Keele and Lawrence.

Jock report vague

By RANDY ROBERTSON

The report of a task force on athletics puts emphasis on maximum use of existing facilities on campus.

The report, discussed Monday at a meeting of the Internal Affairs Committee, suggests that these facilities could be used much more efficiently.

U of T president John Evans commented that "people have been thinking in terms of a new building and now it is a question of resources and the maximization of resources".

Evans said that there was "a pretty important distinction" between the two approaches.

Evans also noted that "even if we do put up a new building we are still left with the problem of renovations and alteration of existing facilities, especially in relation to Hart House."

The task force's conclusions have been formulated in the light of the changing emphasis in physical education on campus. U of T vice-president Jill Conway noted in introducing the document to the committee.

Task force member Brian Levitt said that the "accent of the report is on getting people participating" in athletic activities.

Levitt said that the report, if adopted, represents a major policy decision and a definite turning away from the idea of the professional athlete.

The task force also recommends a new governing structure for athletics on campus, either the complete integration of the two athletic departments (men's and women's) and the School of Health and Physical Education, or the administrative separation of the two bodies, each to report separately to Internal Affairs.

The report also recommends that a liaison committee be set up to deal with outside groups — with the community around the university and with other athletic groups in the city.

Plenty of material available for McDonald's zooburgers

The Toronto Zoological Society has handed its prime food concession for the new Metro zoo to the huge U.S. owned McDonald food corporation in spite of the zoo's well publicized claim to be the pride of naturalists everywhere.

"McDonald's is an empire built on garbage" according to Pollution Prober Greg Bryce who complained to Metro's Executive Committee about awarding of the concession last July.

Bryce raised the question of the amount of garbage that will be produced at the site and why that was not considered in the awarding of the contract.

Bryce cited the serious problem that garbage disposal is becoming in Toronto and suggested that the problem be dealt with at its roots.

The Metro executive discussed the issue twice in August but merely concerned itself with reviewing the contract, and council approved it earlier this September.

Project manager of the zoo, Allen Chapple, said there was a stipulation about overpackaging in the McDonald's contract.

But the zoo authorities were undoubtedly more interested in the anticipated six to ten per cent cut they will get on McDonald's profits at the Scarborough zoo.

Apparently McDonald's had the edge in bidding for the contract because of its ability to easily finance the expensive restaurant and snack bar complex that will be constructed before the zoo opens in 1974.

It has been estimated by University of Illinois Engineering professor Bruce Harmon that McDonald's use 315 square miles of forest a year for all their packaging. And where, one wonders, does McDonald's get its forests from?

The world wide operation has sales of over one billion dollars annually and operates in nine countries employing 130,000 workers in over 2,500 restaurants.

Profits are maximized by a slick, $50 million gimmicky advertising campaign aimed at children and ensuring wide recognition of the big M and Ronald McDonald.

During the last two weeks, The Varsity has joined progressive people around the world in condemning the military seizure of power in Chile. Democratic rights have been crushed in that country, at least temporarily, and it is disappointing, although not entirely unexpected, that more Canadians have not raised their voices against the overthrow of a democratically-elected government. The burden of protest has been carried by leftists.

But the vociferous manner in which leftists have protested the Chilean coup has opened the left to charges of hypocrisy, since left-wing protest against repression in certain "socialist" countries is noticeably quieter.

During the same period as left-wingers have been legitimately outraged at Chilean repression, the press and leaders of the Soviet Union have been carrying on a vicious smear campaign directed at those few intellectuals who have had the courage to speak out against authoritarian rule in the USSR. The campaign, including a "flood" of letters to Soviet editors is undoubtedly carefully orchestrated by the Soviet rulers, and is possibly a prelude to the arrest of many Soviet dissenters, notably Nobel Prize winning author Alexander Solzhenitsyn and eminent physicist Andrei Sakharov.

One could reasonably expect liberals and leftists in the West to do all in their power to defend and encourage these individuals who are literally risking their lives in pressing for democratic rights in the Soviet Union. Yet most leftists and leftist groups seem dumbfounded, and with no rational excuse. After all, it isn't exactly heresy in Canada to condemn Soviet policy.

It's not that the left favors Soviet-style repression in the name of "socialism". — In fact, the overwhelming majority of leftists do condemn Soviet authoritarianism — it's just that the contrast between protest against Chile, South Africa, Portugal, etc., and protest against "socialist" countries is just too noticable to be ignored.

After all, Solzhenitsyn, Sakharov, and ethnic minorities fighting for civil rights are part of the Soviet left, since they are fighting against the Soviet ruling class. But you wouldn't know it, the way they have become such right-wing heroes. In fact, the lack of left-wing protest against "socialist" totalitarianism has turned that issue into an exclusively "right wing issue". The only interpretation of Soviet events loud enough to hear is the argument that repression is some kind of inherent characteristic of "socialism" or "communism" — neither of which exist in the Soviet Union.

Leftists seem to have stood idly by while large segments of the population have accepted the argument that socialism is impossible without degeneration into the kind of repressive atmosphere which characterizes the countries that now call themselves "socialist". This is an abdication of responsibility to say the least.

Of course, the right wing has its own reasons for charging the left with hypocrisy, and it is important to point out the right is guilty of the same type of actions (they were, for example, conspicuously silent about the events in Chile). But if leftists are to have any credibility, they cannot just dismiss the criticisms as a right-wing play. The criticism is legitimate, if not constructive, and leftists must come to terms with it.

In nominating Sakharov for the Nobel Peace Prize recently, Solzhenitsyn condemned "liberals" in the West for their reluctance to speak out against the actions of Communist governments, in contrast to their quick denunciations of rightist oppression. This statement should have spurred leftist groups on to new heights of protest, yet hardly a whisper was heard in reaction to what was almost an invitation by Solzhenitsyn to show the Soviet ruling class what socialists around the world really think of "socialist" authoritarianism.

The lack of support by the left for Solzhenitsyn and his comrades amounts to a betrayal of the principles in which leftists profess to believe, and a betrayal of Solzhenitsyn himself, who obviously needs help and support from abroad. Solzhenitsyn knows what the left should also know: the Soviet ruling class is very conscious of its world-wide image. It would be particularly embarrassing to the Soviet rulers if they saw that their supposed "allies" were getting involved in a "right-wing" cause.

There is enough oppression, repression and depression in the world to occupy all the time of even the most protest-happy political group, but this is no excuse to leave the issue of Soviet repression to people who want to "save the world from socialism." If the left is to be credible and relevant and sincere, left-wingers must protest injustice everywhere, including countries which pay lip service to the rhetoric of socialism.

Let's not give the Globe and Mail an excuse to ask, as it did in an editorial on September 14, "How many Western liberal groups have fired off telegrams to the Kremlin to defend (Solzhenitsyn's) rights and the freedom of Mr. Sakharov?"

THB lists guide, they don't impede

Brevity and concision are virtues fraught with danger.

Under the heading "Inaccuracy in Eaton article" in Monday's Varsity, Mr. Andrew Gregorovich comments that The Varsity's report on the Reitman Building at 188 Yonge Street was "very prompt if not quite accurate". Thanks solely to the alertness of Ellen Moorhouse it was, indeed, prompt. Pace Mr. Gregorovich, however, it was also, basically, accurate.

Mr. Gregorovich, my respected colleague in the university and on the Toronto Historical Board, says that "the proposal made by Douglas Richardson to add Eaton's warehouses and other Eaton buildings to the THB List was vetoed by the board".

I believe this to be misleading in three respects:

1) the proposal was not made by me and it seems pointless, in any case, to single out one member of the THB from another as the board considers (though it does not necessarily approve) every recommendation made to it and it welcomes all suggestions but I am happy to say that I supported listing architecturally important buildings in this area without regard for any projects which may exist for new construction on the site (it would be more accurate to say that I presented the proposal);

2) the board has already listed several structures in the area bounded by Queen, Yonge, Dundas and Bay streets (old City Hall, Holy Trinity Church, Trinity Rectory, Scadding House) and at its meeting of September 18 saw fit to add two other buildings in addition to 188 Yonge Street in this area to the list: the Victorian commercial block at the south-west corner of Yonge and Teraulay Street and the Eaton warehouse at the south-east corner of James and Louisa Street;

3) further discussion regarding the listing of certain structures in the same area (as well as other portions of the city) was deferred—the proposal was not vetoed until the next meeting of the Board.

It should be added that before this listing can take effect (i.e. to permit the city to delay granting a demolition permit for any of these structures for a maximum of 60 days) the THB must present these recommendations to city council for their endorsement.

Finally, whatever one's personal opinion may be of the Eaton-Fairview project and its impact on the city, one may hope that the THB lists will soon be viewed by the public and by its own board members as the helpful guides they are intended to be. They are not a malicious device to delay or frustrate any development good, bad or indifferent. Instead, they are meant to be dispassionate assessments of buildings and sites possessing significant architectural or historical character which should be taken into account, incorporated sympathetically and even complemented by new construction when and only when city council can approve such construction as warranted in the best interests of this city.

All services free at legal clinic

To avoid any question of misunderstanding, there are three clarifications to be made with respect to the article on the Campus Legal Assistance Centre in the September 24 Varsity.

(1) The cost of $65 with respect to change of name applications refers to court and publication costs, not payments to law students. All services provided by law students are on a volunteer basis and they can accept no compensation of any kind.
(2) At all times clients deal with law students, not lawyers. The law student then consults, where necessary, with lawyers or more experienced students.

(3) The legal restrictions on our jurisdiction are (1) in criminal matters to summary conviction matters and elective offences where the crown elects to proceed by summary, and (2) in civil matters to the small claims court ($400 maximum recoverable judgment).

More urgent need to oppose coup

As the slaughter of workers, students and peasants continues at the hands of the military junta in Chile, diplomatic recognition from Canada may be imminent. The generals have blockaded literally thousands of political prisoners and Latin American exiles in stadiums, prisons, and foreign embassies (including Canada's). The need to oppose the coup in Chile is greater and more urgent than ever.

The Chile Solidarity was formed by several groups and individuals who agreed to carry out a solidarity campaign, presently organized around the slogans "No Recognition or Aid to the Junta" and "Immediate Asylum for Refugees and Exiles". We invite everyone who is interested to attend a meeting this Sunday to consider bases of unity, future activities, structure, and name for the committee. In other cities across Canada, groups representing all political currents and interests have worked together to carry out effective solidarity campaigns.

So far in Toronto it has not been possible to unite all opponents of the Chilean coup in one defence movement, but this is our goal. Therefore we welcome the appeal for unity made by Barb Cameron of the U of T Communist Club last week. In our opinion a basis for unity exists—around shared goals to be determined at Sunday's meeting, with full freedom for all participants to express their own views. We are sure that Barb Cameron, the Communist Party, the Committee for a Democratic Chile, and all others, regardless of their views on other questions, will want to unite against the repression in Chile.

Varsity reviewer

co-opted by Globe?

If I didn't know better, I'd have thought your reviewer Linda McQuaig, "Why is a course critique like a sexbook", was some kind of a Marxist-Leninist freak, or something. Her co-optation by the capitalist czars of the Toronto Globe and Mail only allays my suspicions somewhat.

This fear is based on the attitude she displays, not unlike many such "revolutionaries", when she criticizes the students who answer course evaluations.

That "sixty per cent of the class says that they would take the course again", that "the resulting impression is that it all sort of balances out", and that most professors are not damned by their students, seems to upset her greatly.

I am reminded of many recent western pseudo-radicals who, unable to convince the masses to join "the revolution", turn to criticizing those poor be knighted souls for their ignorance.

If McQuaig could only doff her elitist blinkers, she yet might recognize students' ability to judge their own professors.

Lecture timing "outrageous"

It seems the Arab Student Association has sunk to a new level of cowardice. In a master stroke of strategic timing they have scheduled a lecture by Dr. Norton Mezvinsky on "The Dezonization of Israel" to take place Wednesday evening, September 25th - which just happens to coincide with the beginning of Rosh Hashonah, the Jewish New Year. We have known all along that these people are not interested in dialogue with Jews on the Israel-Palestine problem, but we did not imagine that they were so mortified of dissent from their views that they would engineer a presentation of their position on one of the holiest days in the Jewish religious calendar, a time when practically every Jew is at synagogue.

What are we to make of the Palestinians' oft-repeated assertion that they are opposed only to the "secular Zionist political state", while having the greatest respect for the Jewish religion, its institutions and practices? What are we to make of people who speak of living in harmony with Jews in a democratic binational state, yet are afraid to let them in on the planning of this state? And what are we to make of Dr. Mezvinsky, a Jew by birth, (I admit it with shame) who is consumed with so vicious and perverse a self-hatred that he would preach the destruction of Israel to a Gentile audience on Rosh Hashonah, of all days of the year?

So much for the myth that anti-Zionists are not anti-Semites. The outrageous and offensive activities of the Arab Student Association speak for themselves.

Assault case put off

An arbitration hearing on the case of two U of T groundsmen trying to regain their jobs was postponed yesterday after the workers fired the lawyer hired by their union to represent them.

Greg Keilty and Claude Browne were fired after their arrests for assaulting U of T Police in a demonstration last February. The demonstration was protesting layoffs of several workers by the university. Since then the charges have been thrown out of court.

Keilty and Browne claim that the lawyer, hired by the Service Employees International Union, refused to defend them the way they wanted and they fired him at the last minute.

At this point, they said, the union withdrew from the arbitration and the court decided to ask for written submissions from the union, the university and Keilty and Browne on whether the arbitration should continue.

Apparently the grievance must legally be between the union and the employer, not the individual and the employer. Keilty and Browne want to proceed but the union has now withdrawn. A decision on whether the case can continue will be handed down on October 19.

Little time given to reply, says SAC

New guidelines proposed for room rental

By RANDY ROBERTSON

SAC president Bob Anderson argued Monday at an Internal Affairs Committee meeting that SAC had not replied to the committee's policy paper on rental charges for non-academic use of university space because it had only received a proposed scale of rates that morning.

Anderson agreed with the committee that SAC had known since spring that the Internal Affairs committee was reviewing its policy on room allocation. But he said that SAC had intended to withhold comment until it knew what the specific rental rates the committee intended to charge were.

Anderson claimed that the administration had not really developed something for SAC to react to until the day of the meeting.

Co-ordinator for Campus Services Lois Reimer admitted that the chart detailing the rates had only been typed and distributed that day.

Reimer said she understood Anderson's hesitation to approve the guidelines in themselves since they might result in unfavourable rates. Yet she claimed that it was difficult to set the rates without the guidelines.

Anderson said that these guidelines were "highly suspect."

U of T vice-president Jill Conway admitted that the issue of room allocation was "an extraordinarily complex question."

"It brings us to the issue of the university administration in relation to free debate on campus," she said.

Conway said that the issue brings up the question of the university's relations with the outside community.

She concluded that "there are important policy decisions involved here."

Conway noted that the university often has to provide security for various events.

The policy paper recommends that security for an event be provided at the university's discretion at no extra charge to the user.

The paper recommends, more generally, that there be two categories of users: university-affiliated or university-sponsored and non-university but non-commercial.

The paper recommends that charges for room rental be determined on the basis of these criteria:

- whether or not the group is charging admission.
- what type of room — Convocation Hall, auditoriums, and rooms — is being rented.
- time of day (after 5 pm and weekends to cost more)

The paper, suggesting that the rental of room "should be an over-all, break-even proposition", presents a scale of rental charges for "auditoria-type" facilities such as the Medical Sciences auditorium.

This scale, for a university user, not charging admission recommends no charge during regular working hours, and $10 rental per hour outside regular working hours.

For a university user charging admission it suggests $10 per hour and $15 per hour respectively be charged.

For a non-university user not charging admission it recommends $10 per hour during regular working hours and $20 outside regular working hours be charged.

For a non-university user charging admission it recommends that $15 per hour and $30 per hour respectively be charged.

The university charged any university group renting the auditorium for the evening $8.40 last year.

No distinction was then made between university groups charging admission and those not charging admission.

More $ for scholars in Ontario

By KRIS SOSNOWSKI

Several Ontario universities including York and Western have recently created special entrance admission scholarship programs for first-year students.

George Fontaine, Director of Student Awards at York, says that York's scholarship program, established in 1959, was reconstituted last March. Grade 13 students applying to York for 1973-74 with an 80 per cent average in six credits received scholarships of $660 covering tuition.

Fontaine says that the scholarships may have "firmed up students' decisions" to attend York.

A Council of Ontario Universities sub-committee established in June to develop common guidelines and policies for awarding entrance admission scholarships will require that all fifteen Ontario Universities disclose their entrance scholarship programs for the first time.

The COU Special Committee on Undergraduate Scholarship Policy was created out of concern that some universities were increasing their entrance admission scholarships in order to attract first class students away from other universities, thereby developing excessive competition between the institutions.

In order to prevent universities from using entrance admission scholarships as a competitive recruiting device, the COU initially made a recommendation that if a student were to decide to attend the university of his second choice because he received an admission scholarship, then the university for which he had indicated first preference would receive compensation.

The university granting the scholarship would then give up its Basic Income Unit or grant support for that student to the university which had been first choice, assuming that the student had been accepted there.

This proposed method was tabled at the COU in favor of further study. The U of T Governing Council in a June meeting endorsed the principle of curbing the escalation of scholarship inducements but did not support the manner of implementation.

Director of Student Awards at the U of T, Patrick Phillips, says that the university has not expanded its undergraduate admission scholarship program. U of T is waiting to hear the preliminary report of the COU Committee, due to appear in late November or early December.

Vic votes tomorrow

By BILL HUTUL and DAVE LINE

Victoria University students will be voting tomorrow in the fall elections for Victoria University Student Administrative Council (VUSAC).

As in the spring elections, there were no election assemblies this fall. Election assemblies are called for in the council constitution, but it is left up to individuals nominated to organize the elections. The organizers felt that because the assemblies have been poorly attended, there was no point in making an exhibition of student apathy.

For the post of Finance Commissioner, T. Michelle Harvey needs only an acclamation vote, since she is the only nominee.

For Services Commissioner there are three nominations: Michael Stratford, Vic IV, John Morgan, Vic I, and Jean Greatbatch, Vic II. Morgan was the only candidate to put forth an issues platform with his nomination.

Morgan first comments on the Vic pub. Last year the pub cost VUSAC $1,500, but, Morgan says, "at 40 cents a bottle, there seems to be no reason for the pub to lose money." He advocated tighter control of pub operations, and a prompt opening of the pub at the beginning of the year. There has only been one pub this year, and that was a post-orientation pub, not a Vic pub.

Another issue the platform touched was entertainment at Vic.

"Although the budget is small the possibility of bringing in bands for the Vic Pub will be looked into," said Morgan.

Morgan also considers services provided by Victoria's land development. Although the combined Manufacturer's Life and Victoria University development on Charles Street never got under way, Morgan contends this is an area that students should pay particular attention to, as the development issue will undoubtedly arise again. Improving existing service developments, such as expanding Vic's book store, would "increase its usefulness to students," according to Morgan.

There are ten nominations for the five council members-at-large, two of whom must come from first year: Tim Lowman, Allen Brechley, Gregory Coutts, and Alex Mielnik, first year students, Julie Mizen, Vic II, Tim Maclean, and Beverlee Ritchie, third year students, and Janet Davis, David Frazer and Robert Morris, fourth year contenders.

Last April, only 250 Victoria students, a small minority of the student body, bothered to vote. VUSAC president Brian Gazley commented that "it is unfortunate that VUSAC receives so much criticism from students who don't even participate in the political process by voting."

You'll see how we save you money.

Chemical products labelled as food

By David Cubberly
adapted from the chevron

With Internal Affairs discussing food policy on campus this year we thought we would run a piece on food and its quality. Little can be done through demanding better food service. As the article reveals, our complaints and opposition should be directed at the corporations and the advertisers which promote the products.

Next time you're at the grocery store shopping and you make it to the breakfast foods section, let your eyes come to rest on a jar of Tang. Tang is an "instant breakfast drink" with added vitamins that claims to be "natural tasting" and, if we are to believe the men who market it is better than ordinary orange juice. Now, note the following list of ingredients: sugar, citric acid (for tartness), natural flavor gum arabic (vegetable gum for body), monosodium phosphate and potassium citrate (regulate tartness), calcium phosphate (prevents caking), Vitamin C, cellulose gum, hydrogenated coconut oil, artificial flavour, artificial colour, Vitamin A and butylated hydroxyanisole.

If we delete the three major nutritives from our breakfast compound (one of which is a sugar, a dubious nutritive in the modern diet, and two of which are synthetic vitamins) we are left with 10 other substances integral to the mixture but with no basic nutritional value. These mysterious items, once correctly referred to as "chemical additives" but now, due to the food industry's increasing sensitivity to "public opinion", known as "food additives", are part of an ever-growing list of chemicals sanctioned for blanket or partially regulated use within the North American diet.

While no one has isolated the exact figure on the number of chemical additives now in use, it is clear that there are upwards of 3,000 that are commonly used, less than 10 per cent of which have any nutritional value at all. In 1965 Americans consumed 661 million pounds of them in every conceivable form, for the most part without knowing it; these additives wholesaled for about $285 million and their turnover meant that the notorious "average individual" processed about three pounds of them. By 1974 it is estimated that the quantity of these chemicals in our food will have soared to one billion pounds per annum.

What function do non-nutritive additives serve? Why are they in our food and where do they come from? What type of effect can they be expected to have on the human body? These are natural questions, the kind that spring quickly to mind if one does any amount of label reading in the modern supermarket.

Our ignorance lets us be manipulated

Unfortunately the answers to them are veiled by our ignorance of the modern food industry and the inner workings of our own bodies, just as the chemical additives in literally every substance we now eat are shielded by the lack of stringent labelling regulations. In response to this type of widespread ignorance (a lack of knowledge which they feel government and the food industry have actively sponsored) Gene Marine and Judith Van Allen researched and wrote the book Food Pollution: The Violation of Our Inner Ecology.

Worrying over the gathering, processing and cooking of his food is certainly not the forte of 20th century North American man. A product of his civilization, he has conveniently come to believe (as the advertisers have worked so diligently to persuade him), that if it can be pre-made, pre-mixed and pre-cooked and need only be dropped in boiling hot water in order to have it taste exactly like granny's, it's better. It's never like granny's and it's never better; we trade ease for quality every time.

More trusting and lazy than vigilant, we have allowed our diet, our essential life line, to fall entirely under the control of massive corporations who specialize in making more from less for larger profits. Meanwhile they spend revenues on advertising which identifies their latest mutilated product as the hallmark of scientific progress, thus pitching to a prejudice which lies at the core of our civilization. Food Pollution begins to deal with these and other myths which influence our lives by taking a long, sober look at the facts surrounding the food industry and its contemporary reliance on additives.

The danger of additives is often pooched from the companies producing them and the advertisers pushing them. Instead they argue that additives are mainly used in the manufacture of synthetic or "unnatural" compounds - like Tang - and can easily be avoided by sticking to a "good healthy diet". It's definitely the case that there are more and more junk compounds - like snacks, toppings, whips and dips - on the market all the time and that food scientists and their corporate keepers want to see "our" diet evolve more and more in that direction because it's so profitable marketing waste.

Take an average

The Mad Scientists

A minor example. If we'd eaten under bread, or been tempted by the pie section, or maybe had a hot lunch with gravy and tinned vegetables we might easily have filled a column of print enumerating the unadvertised additives involved. The Mad Scientists, as Marine and Van Allen prefer to call them, are everywhere. While most additives are a relatively recent development, these "food technicians" have quickly developed an expansive inventory of uses for them:

"...dyes, bleaches emulsifiers, antioxidants, preservatives, flavours, buffers, noxious sprays, acidifiers, alkalizers, colorants, moisteners, drying agents, gases, extenders, thickeners, disinfectants, defoamers, fungicides, neutralizers, sweeteners, anticaking and antifoaming agents, conditioners, curers, hydrolyzers, hydrogenators, maturers, fortifiers, and many others."

While some may find this list a fitting paean to the wonders of modern science, others may be puzzled as to the reasons for its existence. No matter what its use - whether it makes a poorer quality and smaller volume of the base ingredient go much further (like MSG in baby foods); whether it covers the taste of rotten foods so that the public will find the taste acceptable or smooths out moldy and inferior foods into a new consistency (like sodium hexametaphosphate in process cheese); or even if it works to give chicken flesh and egg yolks a deeper yellow colour (like dried algae meal, tagetes meal and tagetes extract) because our mode of production has rendered them anemic and depleted - they are only included because they serve to increase the food manufacturer's profit margin.

Health Statistics faulty

One of the most common ways of sidestepping controversy concerning diet and those pesky little additives is to glibly point to the "accepted statistics" concerning American health, a trick the food companies may have learned from the government or the American Medical Association. This argument hinges on something known as "life expectancy", a notion whereby the "average American" can expect to live for 70.1 years, one of the higher "averages" in the world.

However, the increase in this figure for America can be accounted for almost entirely in terms of the decrease in levels of infant mortality rather than any increase or extension of old age.

As Food Pollution notes "life expectancy" is one of those willfully misused concepts which takes no account of the quality of life involved. Even if reality has it that from age 40 on an increasing percentage of the population will only be kept alive by constant nursing and restricted movement, or by radiation treatments, it is taken to mean the same thing as living healthfully, so far as statistics are concerned.

Moreover, while infant mortality, maternal deaths and deaths due to infectious diseases have declined markedly in the face of modern medicine, degenerative diseases (the ones that departments of health would have us believe are synonymous with old age) are increasing dramatically. In 1967 heart disease, cancer, arteriosclerosis and vascular lesions accounted for 68.7 per cent of all deaths in the US. Comparative figures for cancer are intriguing: in 1900 it claimed 64 persons per 100,000 population; by 1940 it had leapt to 147 persons per 100,000; while by 1967 it had jumped to 364.5 per 100,000.

Additives mean a loss of nutrients

Food Pollution points out that much of the use made of additives is as a replacement for, or cover for, nutrients lost during mass production. Mass processing, the high point of modern industry, makes its money by handling huge quantities of materials, shunting them through series of simplified stages until the end product is achieved.

The loss of a few vitamins and minerals along the way is hailed as a small price to pay for such productivity. The feat of replacing a few of them, along with a lot of other devices to increase productivity, is touted as one of the marvels of modern science. This beggared productivity is encouraged because it is synonymous with profit, a pursuit so bewitching that even the most commonplace beliefs — such as the necessity for good eats — have been sacrificed to it.

The willingness to use chemicals to increase profits goes far beyond food processing today, stretching its tentacles down into agricultural production. While many must by now be aware of our still-increasing reliance on chemical pesticides with their attendant residues, there is little public knowledge about the burgeoning use of drugs in the raising of animals.

More than half the antibiotics used in the US today are consumed on farms. And as agribusiness remakes the old fashioned farm in the image of the mass production line — as outfits like Montford in Denver push this phenomenon until they fatten "600,000 cattle every year on just 800 acres of land", with better than 400 head of cattle cluttering each acre of land (in pens cleaned only three or four times a year) — so the animals' fragile existences are more completely controlled through the administration of drugs.

When cattle first arrive they're given up to 1,000 mg. streptomycin and penicillin per day with their grains (to ward off "shipping fever") so that they'll fatten at the profitable rate of three pounds per day, pellets of diethylstilbestrol (DES), "a female hormone which relaxes their muscles and loads them with moisture and fat", are injected in their ears. Female heifers chew melengestrol acetate — a hormone which curbs their sex drive — every day. Problems like liver abscesses, developed through excessive eating, are dispensed with by flushing oxytetracycline through the beast.

Heavy doses of the same are administered during the last few days of fattening. A little shot of streptomycin is given before heading for the slaughterhouse and just before the kill a hypodermic of "papaya juice enzyme" is injected to tenderize the meat when it is cooked. The only problem with all of this is that residues show up increasingly frequently in the meat we eat, illegal quantities of antibiotics which could easily be causing damage to our systems.

Even bread isn't bread

Unfortunately, the insanity of playing with chemicals in our food supply does not end here, as an examination of any of our staple goods will show. To illustrate we'll use bread, one of the examples selected in Food Pollution. The similarity between what the pre-modern world knew as bread and the starchy white pap that most of us unquestioningly eat today ends with the name. The invention of the steel rolling mill in the late 1800's provided the impetus whereby the "white is right" prejudice regarding flour could be carried to a new extreme.

Steel mills make it possible to separate entirely the bran and wheat germ from the white, essentially nutritionless endosperm from which we make our flour. Sadly, rather than grind flour the way stone mills used to, steel mills "pulverize" the wheat, releasing valuable oils throughout the product which, if stored for any length of time, become rancid. To deal with this, to age the flour artificially and to make it palatable. Scientists invented "bleaching" which obliterates whatever nutrients remain.

Up to the time when most common bleaching (nitrogen trichloride), even it caused "running fits" in regulatory agencies had categories of chemicals per agents including nitroperoxides, azodicarbonation with other agents and pounds.

Until this point in the techniques have eliminated Vitamin E, the minerals (essential fatty acids, and acids like methionine...". to the silky fine powder "homemakers" are reported bread we would have the lengthy lists of additives:

"All in all there are 90 which you can get in a somebody forgets the ham be listed on the bread label have any nutrient value.

You don't avoid this de picking up brown bread whole wheat flour either: allowed in the manufacture and the entire list of additives well. The additives are there has depleted the substance, because they stretch visually presentable the order to maximize the meat.

Perhaps it's naive, at some point reason will assume that the increase overseen by some public agency; that scientific being undertaken to effects of chemical additives evidence from these tested; that even if nutrients are at least neutral. It's which encourage most about our diet at a market.

Is the job of the Food (FDA), an agency with al budget of $72 million charged with regulating surrounding food, as ing standards and inilitating scientific studies to determine the effects of food additives.

Given the enormity of the task and the poverty of resources, situations like a staff of two part-time employees working to enforce the "Fair Packaging and Labelling Act of 1965" (the one that sets out what must appear on the label) are most common. This is a toothless act, filled with loopholes and not even moving towards full ingredient listing, and with two enforcers there is no hope that even it will be observed.

In practice the FDA has historically interpreted its role as that of a public relations agency for the food firms (little more than a buffer between corporation and public) which activates each time some excess finds its way into the press. The sulluted history of the FDA is well documented in a superb small book entitled The Chemical Feast.

A product of a Ralph Nader study group published by the Centre for Responsive Law, this book chronicles the friendship between the agency from its inception and the food firms. Its results, summarized and updated in Food Pollution, systematically destroy any residual hope that the upsurge of chemical additives has been carefully regulated from the beginning.

Some will counter that regulation does occur and point to the removal of cyclamates as hope for the future. Cyclamates are non-nutritive sweeteners, compounds like Sucraly Sodium, designed ostensibly for use by diabetics but quickly expanded by the ad men into a bane for our almost universal obesity.

The first cyclamate received FDA approval in 1950 and was marketed by Abbot Laboratories, despite test results showing "a highly suspicious frequency of lung tumours", not to mention some "rare ovarian, kidney, skin, or uterine tumours" which appeared in a quick test sponsored by the FDA.

That was in 1950. The National Academy of Sciences-National Research Council's Food Nutrition Board warned the FDA about possible harmful effects from cyclamates in 1954, 1955, 1962 and 1968. Despite these indicators, cyclamates were still granted full stature as an available food additive on the FDA's newly created Generally Recognized as Safe (GRAS) list.

Due to this listing cyclamates underwent widespread changes in usage, becoming prominent in everything from cured ham to Kool-Aid.
Use was virtually unrestricted, labelling almost entirely unrequired and cyclamates made their way into better than 75 per cent of American homes.

By 1966 tests run in Japan indicated that in about one third of the population ingested cyclamates converted to cyclohexylamine (CHA), a chemical so dangerous that even the FDA has stringently restricted its use in food processing.

The direct dosage derived from one package of Kool-Aid was 320 times that considered permissible for CHA.

Moreover, in 1968 Dr. Jacqueline Verrett, an FDA biochemist, reported that in a study in which cyclamates were injected into chicken eggs it was found that "calcium cyclamate, cyclohexylamine, and dicyclohexylamine are specific teratogens, having the ability to produce phocomelia and similar defects in the embryos." Teratogenic effects, of which phocomelia is one, are gross deformities such as misplaced, reversed or mangled appendages.

Further studies of CHA completed that year by FDA scientist Marvin Legator showed conclusively that the substance could cause chromosome damage in both animals and humans. The FDA ignored its own sources entirely and allowed the cyclamates to remain on GRAS listing.

When cyclamates were eventually banned in 1969, the minister in charge based his decision on a single experiment which resulted in an unusual number of bladder cancers in rats. Not only was the gentleman reluctant to ban cyclamates, but subsequently the ministry allowed industries using cyclamates a full year to rid themselves (into our stomachs, of course) of their goods, so as to minimize financial losses.

There was no public education campaign, no explanation as to why documented studies had been ignored for 20 years, and no attempt in any way to alter the practices which had permitted a proven carcinogen and teratogen to be ingested publicly for so long.

Cyclamates are one small instance; they were acted upon only because some of the knowledge about their properties was led by scientists with integrity and, following fast on the heels of the thalidomide affair, a major scandal was threatened. That's a freak occurrence and we still have to deal with the more than 3,000 additives in quantities and combinations of which we can have no knowledge, given current labelling practices.

No difference in Canada

Recently the Minister of Health and Welfare for Canada, Marc Lalonde, suggested to the Canadian Dietetic Association that due to the sheer variety of foodstuffs available "only the most traditional and strong-willed woman would be capable of controlling the eating habits of her household and of knowing what everybody was eating."

He's wrong. No one today knows what it is we're getting. They don't have to tell us it's in there and until we make it law you can bet they won't volunteer the information. It isn't in their interest.

Not only does the consumer not know what he's getting, but no one knows what it's going to do to him. Given the nature of food regulations, the onus for proof of product toxicity lies with the regulatory agency. Corporations do test, but usually only enough to get their product GRAS listing.

The burden for initiating comprehensive testing of the type which would fill in our knowledge of the chemical in question lies with the public agency.
The one with inadequate funds that Food Pollution has shown can't be trusted. The way things now work this group tests already marketed chemicals which it finds suspect, items which we may have been processing through our insides for years without question.

The variety and complexity on which our diet is based means a continuous dousing of our bodies with a chemical bath of ever-new components.
Those who would — like the authors of Food Pollution — raise question about the "Totality of toxicity", the gross aggregate of poisons to which we are daily subjected, run head on into an industry-generated wall of pseudo-scientific propaganda about "safe levels" and "acceptable doses" of poisonous substances.

These phrases, invented when the industry was first refused permission to market one of its pet substances, are premised in the belief that there is some sort of minimum level beneath which ingestion of an agent, be it toxic, carcinogenic, what-have-you, is safe. These "concepts", based on the fallacy that there can ever be a "safe level" of a toxic substance, serve to hide the fact that no one has any idea what the compounds we absorb will do to us in combination.

It is a simple fact of modern processing that these colourants are almost always consumed in concert with emulsifiers (glycerides or poly compounds). Emulsifying agents are used in everything from ice cream to bread (where they serve important purposes like causing the base substance to absorb more water) and when ingested tend to destroy the balance of emulsifiers already at work in our system, promoting increased absorption through the stomach and intestines of whatever is in our system (including, of course, the additives).

Independent tests on emulsifiers show that they clearly encourage the absorption of carcinogenic agents, yet they remain, indeed increase, as common, accepted components of our diet.

Book reveals contradictions

The list of these types of contradictions is virtually limitless and, from a reading of Food Pollution, one is certainly made aware of the whole subject of food and the magnitude of the problem.

Only three weeks left to apply.

The woodwork still holds illegal immigrants

By DICK BROWN

With less than three weeks left for illegal immigrants to come forward and apply for landed immigrant status during the government's grace period, both immigration officials and independent immigration counsellors are worried that not all eligible illegal immigrants in Canada are coming forward.

"We just haven't the number of eligible people we know are out there," said Katie McGovern, a counsellor with the Toronto Anti-Draft Programme.

"So far, we've had just under a thousand inquiries at our office, a big portion of whom are US war resisters. But you can't convince us there's only a few hundred unlanded resisters in Metro Toronto."

Immigration officials in Ottawa express the same fear. A spokesman for Immigration Minister Robert Andras said that unless there is a dramatic last-minute rush, the total numbers will be far less than anticipated.

"With the deadline set at October 15, we're worried, too. Dammit we're worried," he said.

Under the grace period laws, any illegal immigrant who has been in Canada since November 1972, has until October 15 to come forward and register and be judged under relaxed criteria for landed immigrant status.

Shortly after the grace period began on August 15, about 400 persons per day were registering, according to Ottawa immigration officials. After six weeks of government advertising and encouragement to come forward, officials report only a marginal increase in that figure.

"Fear is the biggest reason they aren't coming forward," said McGovern, "and it's hard to criticize anybody with that fear because in the past immigration was pretty heartless and biased at times."

Andras has stated that the current approval rate during the grace period is in excess of 99 per cent. McGovern says that so far everyone her group has dealt with who is eligible has made it.

"Even someone with a conviction for simple possession of marijuana of an ounce or less can get landed if they get pre-cleared through our office," she said.

"That was a major breakthrough last week when immigration decided to look at simple possession on a case by case basis."

Prior to last week, McGovern said, immigration's policy on trivial drug convictions was to deport a person, outright in some cases.

She explained that a counsellor from her group approaches a designated immigration official on a no-names no-questions-asked basis with a person's court record, and immigration rules on the spot (without having the identity of the person) whether the person would be landed or deported.

"This way, the person knows before he or she registers whether their past will let them get in or not," she added, "and at no risk to themselves. Neither immigration nor ourselves need to know a person's name to do this check."

Immigration has also set up this same pre-clearance mechanism with representatives of the Chinese, Caribbean and Ceylonese communities, with other ethnic groups being contacted to see if they want it.

McGovern said the word is beginning to get around slowly that large numbers of people are getting landed during the grace period.

"We're just now beginning to see people who has been sitting on the sidelines checking things out before coming to us to find out what's happening."

This gluttonous provincial gargoyles is hungry for Queen's Park.

Who will get Queen's Park?

By DAVID SIMMONDS

The U of T is continuing negotiations with the city to allow the Ontario government to take-over Queen's Park, the land both north and south of the parliament buildings.

The land, which belongs to the university, was leased to the City of Toronto back in 1859 for 999 years.

Rather than waiting for the lease to expire, the province is anxious to gain control of the land now. According to University capital budgets officer, K.S. Gregory, the city has been maintaining the park since 1966. But the province wants the park kept up at a level higher than the city is willing to provide, perhaps to complement the blushing pink of the newly sand-blasted parliament buildings.

If the deal goes through, the university will have to forego its juicy $6,000 a year rent from the city.

SHOUT serves Alexandra Park community

By ELAINE KAHN

"This is a great place to have a psychiatrist," says Susan Fawcett, a third year medical student working at the SHOUT (Students Health Organization University of Toronto) Alexandra Park Clinic.

The 600 patients serviced free by the clinic each month come mainly from the Ontario Housing Corporation development across the street and the neighbourhood senior citizen's home. Residents' family problems, alcoholism and economic difficulties often result in problems best suited to psychiatric treatment, Fawcett said.

The Augusta Avenue clinic doesn't have a psychiatrist. It does have 48 student doctors—mainly third year—25 nurses, 25 pharmacists and about ten physiotherapists, according to Jim Gibson, third year med student and medical chairman of the clinic.

The clinic—which had a $70,000 budget last year—receives $40,000 from the Ontario Hospital Insurance Plan, and last year it received $15,000 from the Students Administrative Council. Services are free because they are covered by OHIP, but anyone not covered by the plan and unable to pay is given free service.

Psychiatric treatment at the clinic might be difficult anyway, Fawcett said, because patients in the area don't like to come back for more treatment even for the everyday problems the clinic treats.

"You can't get adequate follow-up," she said.

Gibson said the clinic wants to take most of its patients from the community, rather than from the university. In contrast, over a quarter of the patients treated in the seven-chair dental clinic above the medical centre are students.

Four doctors headed by Dr. David Sliwicz supervise the medical clinic. Fawcett said the clinic has had to turn away student volunteers because there is no room for them.

All 125 students in the dental faculty take part in the clinic at some point during the year, six a day plus one supervisor.

The dental clinic treats 24 patients a day and 15 to 20 on each of the two nights it is open, said spokeswoman Rosemarie Schikschneid. Its major source of funds last year was a Canadian women's club, she said, and ten city dental labs donate $100 worth of free lab work every month.

The charge for dental service is $3, which covers everything but lab work, gold-work and dentures. The extra charge for these services covers only the cost of materials, not labour.

Prescriptions in the pharmacy are filled for one dollar, but it must be a prescription ordered by a clinic doctor. The Faculty of Pharmacy partially subsidizes the prescriptions, but like the whole clinic, this section runs at a loss.

Fawcett said the emergency departments of downtown hospitals refer "justifiable complaints that are not emergencies" to the clinic. Student doctors can't perform major surgery, but do all the other routine jobs of a general practitioner, whenever they have the ability.

The dental clinic has a lot of child patients and a program to treat the children at a nearby public school. They're booked solid until November 1.

Most dental cases involve bad teeth or emergency toothaches, said Schikschneid.

Fawcett's husband, Paul, also a third year med student working there, said "It's excellent because we have unscreened patients down there" and have to decide "are they sick or are they well?"

"It's a practical application of what you're learning," Fawcett said.

First year students do the lab work, second year students coordinate the teams attending the patients and by third year, you see the patients, Fawcett noted.

The students would like the community to influence the direction the clinic will take and hope to have a board of directors, with community representatives on it, appointed soon, Gibson said.

"We're very deeply committed to having the community run the place."

South Africans to organize

South Africans in Canada will be holding a conference on the long Thanksgiving weekend next month, as a prelude to setting up a cross-country organization of South Africans in Canada.

According to Bangani Tsotsi, one of the six member steering committee at the U of T which is organizing the conference, the organization will attempt to clarify and publicize the political situation in South Africa.

"While the outside world is vaguely familiar with a few of the country's anachronistic laws, the picture presented does not portray the actual situation," Tsotsi says, because most of the data is reported by the English press, and its reportage is slanted to suit the needs of the White English capitalist class.

Tsotsi contends that the English-speaking South Africans, many of whom are owners of the mining and manufacturing industries, confine themselves to "criticising the excesses of apartheid", because the South African pass laws, for example, "seriously restrict the smooth flow of labour from the countryside to the urban areas." According to legal requirements, urban workers must return to the countryside where they legally reside when they are not employed, as well as live in "locations" outside cities where they work.

The English-speaking South African industrial owners are also critical of the inferior education given to Africans, "in so far as it limits the availability of skilled labor — a necessary condition for the further growth of industry", Tsotsi said. In addition, they would like to see increased wages to create a consumer market and stimulate the economy.

In three major South African cities which are controlled by parties opposing the ruling Boers, the city councils intend to do away with petty apartheid, Tsotsi says, namely, separate entrances into restaurants and other public buildings, separate benches in parks, and so on. The opposition parties and the English-speaking South Africans, he said are "not so much against the system as they are against some of its more annoying features."

Robarts in the park

John P. Robarts is more than just a name on a library. In fact, it is said that he was at one time the Premier of Ontario. And, like all former Ontario premiers, particularly those of the Tory persuasion, Robarts was rewarded a lot of goodies on retirement.

For instance, he is on the board of directors of Abitibi Paper Co., and on the board of Power Corp., which controls Consolidated-Bathurst Ltd. Consolidated-Bathurst has timber-cutting licences in Algonquin Park.

Robarts got another goody last week. He was appointed chairman of the proposed Algonquin Forest Authority which will "ensure that the public interest in the park is adequately protected," according to a Queen's Park press release.

Presumably the "public interest" and the interests of Consolidated-Bathurst will always co-incide, so Robarts will have no problems. This uncanny ability to reconcile differences is undoubtedly what earned him a place on St. George Street (at Harbord).

Homeless books still migrating across campus

By BOB BETTSON

The grand scheme to consolidate the books from various college and branch lending services into the renovated Sigmund Samuel library has not yet been fully implemented.

However, the books from the Political Economy, History, Innis and Extension collections have been removed from their former resting places and are slowly being integrated with the Wallace Room's larger collection.

Many books are still not on the shelves and are stacked in boxes, unused.

The New College and University College collections have not yet been transferred to the Sigmund Samuel Library and probably won't be, for this year.

Last spring the library subcommittee of the Governing Council passed a motion recommending the amalgamation despite protests from students and administration of the colleges.

However, the committee did agree to put off the transfer of books until each college could formulate proposals to maintain "an appropriate and modest library designed to strengthen the academic and intellectual identity of the two colleges."

Plans are to be presented by the end of November and, according to New College Principal Donald Ivey, the New College Council has established a committee which will meet for the first time today.

The amalgamations originally were planned in 1971 as part of a plan to set up an "undergraduate" library at Sigmund Samuel and a "graduate" library in the Roberts fortress.

However with the long successful struggle for open stack access for all members of the university community at the Roberts library the amalgamation's rationale was considerably weakened.

Last year opposition mounted to the amalgamation from both the colleges and the history and political economy departments. However, the library sub-committee approved the 1972 report of the Mueller Presidential Advisory committee and supported the amalgamation.

This came despite the presentation of a petition with 1,000 signatures from the political economy department students and staff, and the pleas of both student councils and administrations of New and University colleges.

Protests to the subcommittee stressed the importance of the libraries to the academic life of the colleges.

Ivey said yesterday that "though it is not realistic to maintain a primarily course-oriented library, my concern is that students in non-reading-oriented courses have easy access to basic reference works."

He was worried that the plan to amalgamate collections might leave only "a few dictionaries and atlases. It depends what is meant by a basic reference collection."

The protests against the amalgamation of the books from history and political economy were based on the highly convenient and personalized service the branch libraries provided.

The only concession made by the committee was the retention of Xeroxed copies of articles at the Political Economy Library in Sidney Smith Hall.

The Sigmund Samuel library has undergone major renovations and books are divided into five subject areas. The stacks are now being renovated and may be used for holding books at a future date.

Non-stop Spadina

Ontario Premier William Davis told the Globe yesterday that he was "more satisfied than ever" about stopping the Spadina Expressway, but many Spadina critics believe the issue is not a dead one at all.

Last week, Metro roads and traffic commissioner Sam Cass proposed that Bathurst Street traffic be rerouted through the Cedarvale Ravine between Lawrence and St. Clair Avenues, part of the old expressway route, while a new $3-million bridge is constructed over the ravine at Bathurst Street.

CORRA vice-president, and long-time expressway critic Ellen Adams said that Cass is still trying to get the expressway through.

Adams also pointed out that the Ontario government has not passed an order-in-council "quashing earlier by-laws" that allow for the expressway construction. CORRA had sent a letter to Davis last October, asking for such an order, and his only response was sending the letter to Ontario Minister of Transportation Gordon Carton.

CORRA is sending another letter to the premier this fall, again requesting that the by-laws be nullified, especially in light of last summer's Ontario cabinet decision to allow the northwest subway to run along the original Spadina Expressway alignment.

Expressway critics viewed the subway decision as the thin edge of the wedge which would ultimately bring the full-fledged expressway to Spadina and Bloor, perhaps after Davis steps down from the Conservative Party leadership.

The Davis Cabinet halted the Spadina expressway in a popular pre-election decision in June 1971.

When Cass brought forward the Cedarvale ravine detour plans with some other possible routes, Alderman Ying Hope accused Metro Chairman Paul Godfrey, still a Spadina Expressway supporter, of using the Bathurst Street closing as a means of forcing a route along the ravine.

Above pre-Roberts library scene proves that the new library had to be built. Students had to sit on top of each other.

O CHILDREN OF MENI

Know ye not why We created you all from the same dust? That no one should exalt himself over the other. Ponder at all times in your hearts how ye were created. Since We have created you all from one same substance it is incumbent on you to be even as one soul, to walk with the same feet, eat with the same mouth and dwell in the same land, that from your inmost being, by your deeds and actions, the signs of oneness and the essence of detachment may be made manifest. Such is My counsel to you, O concourse of light! Heed ye this counsel that ye may obtain the fruit of holiness from the tree of wondrous glory.

Toronto Survival Guide almost didn't survive

By TINA SREBOTNJAK

When the English novelist Wyndham Lewis called Toronto "this sanctimonious icebox" during the World War II years "he couldn't foresee the publication of a book that would show how one could survive Toronto's frigidty and even enjoy its warmth.

The book is the Toronto Survival Guide, published this month by Holy Trinity Church. It is available at most retail outlets, and sells for a paltry 50 cents. Its 251 pages contain information on welfare, unemployment insurance, landlord-tenant rights, birth control, abortion, inexpensive food and clothing, and free or low-cost entertainment.

The production of the guide was a long and arduous process. Conceived by a committee of lay people at Holy Trinity, the project got under way in January and was financed in part by a $6000 Local Initiatives Programme grant. The small staff planned to obtain advertising to defray the costs of production.

One of the firms approached was Carling-O'Keefe, which was according to Ed Burke, Director of Information for the Toronto Survival Guide at Holy Trinity was extremely interested in the project. In fact, it wanted to sponsor the project and to continue doing so when the church published its planned bi-yearly revised editions of the guide.

The condition of the sponsorship was that the brewery be the sole advertiser in the book.

When the staff informed those advertisers who had already been approached that they could not use their ads in the guide, problems naturally rose. These were finally resolved when the staff promised that they would not use the advertising already obtained, but would mention the firm names in the guide.

With the brewery sponsorship came classier production plans, and it was decided that Desbarats Printing Ltd. in Montreal would do the job instead of Guerilla presses in Toronto.

No formal agreement was ever signed between the brewery and the church committee. When the proofs came back and the brewery was given the opportunity to examine them, it reversed its decision on the grounds that the brewery had a community image and the guide did not fit it. It objected to the general tone of the guide which it said was directed largely to transients under 30.

The brewery paid $5000 for typesetting and layout and then had all the work sent back to Toronto where it was finally printed two months later, by Webb Offset, a local printing firm.

The church eventually paid the $2500 printing bill and is now taking a loss on all books sold. However, the church hopes that by raising the price of the guide to a still modest 95 cents it can break even and eventually produce those bi-yearly revision.

Plans for campus centre slowly gather dust

By MARINA STRAUSS

Negotiations drag on for a 1971 campus centre proposal that would link existing university facilities as planners attempt to tally community opinion on it.

The Faculty of Architecture's 1971 proposal "The Campus as the Campus Centre", came after years of unsuccessful attempts by SAC to formalize a student centre plan.

Two years after it issued the Campus Centre Manual, SAC has recommended to university president John Evans that a user's committee, be set up composed of representatives of all elements of the university. The group would consult and report on the community's need for facilities.

SAC failed, however, to include in this group members of the outside community, although SAC vice-president Steve Moses admitted it was an error and that "there definitely should be local residents put on the committee".

The Faculty of Architecture, commissioned by SAC three years to draw up the plans, proposed that commercial elements, like shops, cinemas and cafes, should be created connecting and interrelating existing buildings, especially in the St. George and Wilcocks Street area.

This, it believed, would dispel the university's "ivory tower" image and link it to the city, as well as providing facilities on campus.

St. George Street, it suggested, should be made into a "university-city boulevard".

It rejected student leaders' former suggestions of a new high-rise student centre.

The report writers believed that the existing campus should be improved and modified in subtle ways.

However, negotiations with the university administration have been painfully slow since SAC published the costly Campus Centre manual.

SAC has financed campus centre plans since 1970 from a one dollar levy of each student's SAC fees.

The Faculty of Architecture this month has come up with another Campus Centre brief, this one clearly summarizing its earlier manual, which proved to be incomprehensible to the layman. SAC hopes to distribute this brief widely.

The Governing Council's Planning and Resources Committee is ready to provide $10,000 to engage professional architects for the project, while SAC has allocated $5,000.

"We want to consult with people who will be involved within and without the campus centre", explained Nancy Sutherland, administrative assistant to the Council's Internal Affairs vice-president.

"A users' group will be set up to generate feedback. All groups on campus must be consulted", she stressed.

"Only after that can we engage professional advice".

"Last spring the Planning and Resources committee set up yet another group, half composed of student representatives, to recommend an architect for the project. Instead it recommended postponing the hiring until the Faculty of Architecture clarified its proposals and until users were consulted.

Steve Moses, a student representative on that group, said "the Faculty of Architecture is still very sceptical of hiring architects. It thinks more discussion and more input is needed".

Faculty of Architecture chairman P. Prangnell, responsible for preparing the Centre's recommendations, is not in favor of calling in architects to work with a users' committee.

"The users must be in agreement with everyone involved before architects are asked to design something", Prangnell contended.

He felt that Evans should ask every department head about the project, and that "it would be polite" to consult local residents, although "it doesn't affect them too much".

"The key issue is what happens to St. George," he said. If shops are to be constructed on the street, the city through the university's liaison committee, must be consulted, he said.

He pointed out, for example, the plans call for a bridge between the Nursing and Lash Miller Buildings on St. George. Lash Miller spokesmen have already come out in favour of this, but the Nursing department has yet to decide.

"At this point, you don't need an architect", Prangnell said.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF BY-ELECTION

Due to vacancies arising in the seats on the Governing Council to which Mr. P. Dack and Mr. C.L. Vickery were elected last Spring, the Governing Council has authorized the conduct of two by-elections to elect their successors. The constituencies affected are Graduate Student Constituency II and Full-Time Undergraduate Constituency II, respectively. Guidelines for the by-election follow:

ELECTION GUIDELINES

The University of Toronto Act, 1971, vests in the Governing Council, the government, management and control of the University and of University College, and property, revenues, business and affairs thereof, and the powers and duties of the former Board of Governors and Senate of the University.

In view of the size and complexity of the University and the extensive duties of the Governing Council, it has delegated many of its review powers to working committees. In addition to an Executive Committee, the Council has established an Academic Affairs Committee, a Business Affairs Committee, an External Affairs Committee, an Internal Affairs Committee, and a Planning and Resources Committee. Members of Council currently sit on these committees, and a number of members sit on more than one.

Composition

The Governing Council is composed of 50 members as follows:

- Full-time undergraduate students registered in the Faculty of Medicine are ineligible for nomination in this by-election but may act as nominators (there is currently sitting on the Governing Council a full-time undergraduate student from Medicine).

NOMINATIONS

Nominations are open on September 26th, 1973, and will remain open until October 5th, 1973, at 12:00 noon. Nominations must be sponsored by 15 nominators in the case of Graduate Student Constituency II, and by 50 nominators in the case of Full-time Undergraduate Student Constituency II.

Nominators must be members of the same constituency as the nominee, and a nominator may not nominate more candidates for election than there are seats vacant in his constituency. Nomination forms may be obtained, upon request, from the Office of the Governing Council.

The onus is on the person nominated for election to file a bona fide nomination paper. Errors or irregularities in these papers constitute grounds for rejection of the nomination. Such errors or irregularities may be corrected prior to the close of nominations but not afterwards. The Office of the Governing Council will attempt to notify candidates of any errors prior to the close of nominations. Consequently, candidates are advised to complete and submit their nomination forms early in the nomination period.

The names of candidates nominated for election will be considered public information as they are received. The names of nominators will not be released by the Office of the Governing Council.

A person nominated as a candidate in the election may withdraw his nomination by notarized instrument in writing received by the Office of the Governing Council within 48 hours after the close of nominations. A successful candidate must resign his seat at any time at which he ceases to meet the eligibility requirements for election to that seat.

Election Expenses

Candidate campaign expenses will be refunded up to a limit of $50, on production of bona fide receipts at the close of the election. Each candidate claiming a refund shall submit to the Secretary of the Governing Council a detailed statement of all election expenses incurred by him or on his behalf. Such statements shall be open to examination by any constituent.

Election Schedule

- nominations open - September 26th.
- nominations close - October 5th, 12:00 noon
- voting to be conducted by mailed ballot, ballots mailed on or about October 18th
- close of election - October 29th

BALLOTING METHOD

- ballots will be mailed to each voter at his home address as recorded in the University's record systems;
- each ballot will be accompanied by a small secrecy envelope into which the marked ballot should be sealed;
- also provided will be a return-addressed envelope into which the small secrecy envelope should be sealed;
- voters will be required to provide, on the upper left-hand corner of the return envelope, information sufficient to allow verification of their ballot return;
- each ballot will also be accompanied by an information sheet containing candidates' statements, information on the correct method to return the ballot, information on eligibility to use that particular ballot, and a brief description of the Governing Council;
- persons who receive the wrong ballot due to an error in records will be advised, through advertisements in the campus media, how to obtain the correct ballot;
- all eligible voters are entitled to vote using one ballot;
- in the case of two or more ballots being received from any one voter, both being ballots for a constituency in which the voter is entitled to vote, only the first ballot received by the Office of the Governing Council will be considered valid.

BALLOTING BY VOTERS ABSENT FROM THE CAMPUS

- It is suggested that voters who will be absent from campus during the balloting period arrange to have their ballot forwarded to them. About ten days are allowed for return of ballots.

BALLOT RECEIVING LOCATIONS

- for the convenience of voters who do not wish to return their ballots through the mail, ballots may be handed in at the Office of the Governing Council, Simcoe Hall.

BALLOT MAILING LISTS

- a list will be available shortly prior to and during balloting for inspection by any person at the Office of the Governing Council at hours convenient to the

Unnecessary injuries debase sports program

By CHRIS ROBINSON

The spectre of injury haunts every competitor in almost all team sports. When injuries occur, it is tragic, but when they could have been prevented or alleviated by the proper precautions, then there is something wrong with our athletic priorities.

On Monday the Varsity ran an article by Paul Hoch chronicling the sad lack of adequate preventive measures and medicine for injured athletes in the U.S. How closely does the American situation parallel our own in Canada?

At first glance we seem to be much more humane in our attitudes. A local physician who has trained and practised abroad believes that Canada generally gives injured athletes more expert care than most countries. However, he also feels that most of our coaches and instructors are very lax in taking precautions to minimize injuries.

Football produces more injuries than any other sport, and the commonest of these injuries concern the knee. A few years ago the Philadelphia high schools tried an experiment under medical supervision. For one season every football player used soccer shoes, which have short, rubber cleats and lack a toe cleat. While they lost a certain amount of traction, serious knee injuries were reduced from 96 to 4 in that one season.

The reaction in Canada has been gratifying. Most universities and high schools, including all Toronto schools, the Blues, and U of T inter-faculty teams, have made the use of soccer cleats mandatory. Only a few Maritime colleges persisted in valuing traction above their players' knees.

The concept of football as a suitable sport for high schools has also come under fire in recent years. Spurred on by parental complaints about injuries and rising costs, the North York Board of Education is investigating the possibility of banning football entirely. This action is not just an unreasoned reaction, for at the same time rugby, another sport containing a large element of violence, has been introduced with considerable success. The difference is that rugby is designed to produce a clean, hard-hitting game in which people are rarely hurt, and it has succeeded admirably.

Professional football presents a much more sordid picture. The ideal of "win at any cost" still persists, even if the price is crippling a player for life. If he can be trussed up or anesthetized into acquiescence, in he goes. If he gets hurt worse, who is to say that it isn't just part of the original wound?

Artificial turf is another example of profit measured against players' welfare. The so-called "mod sod" has no give to it because it is laid over a base of asphalt or concrete. Heavy falls on it are far more painful and damaging than on natural turf. In addition, painful burns often result from even minor falls or skids. Real grass, however, is more difficult to maintain, and very uncertain in our raw Canadian climate.

Vic Perera of Eng raises hands in triumph as dejected St. Mike's goalie watches the one that got away. SMC opened Interfac play, defeating defending champs 2-1 on goals by Emile Bartolini, Mike Stasny

For the crippled athlete, there is always the pension fund.

Hockey is another very popular injury-prone sport in Canada. Here again the universities and little leagues have led the way. Among other measures, they have required protective helmets and skate guards for years. Fighting is discouraged and safety generally stressed.

Although the NHL has made attempts to repair its image recently by toughening its rules on fighting, spearing, and high-sticking, the show is better than the reality. Every team has to have a "policeman" who enforces respect by his strength and willingness to fight. One of the most publicized incidents in recent NHL history was the goal Bobby Baun scored to win the Stanley Cup, while playing on a broken leg frozen to stop the pain.

The signs of concern about safety that are appearing foster hope that we may be approaching a more rational philosophy of competitive sports. However, we are still only scratching the surface of the problem. There are tens of thousands of little league games in every sport that receive as supervision the attention of men and women who possess no medical training. Here, where immediate skilled attention could cut permanent injuries drastically, we have nothing, not even a boy scout. Coaches are not required to have even a rudimentary knowledge of first aid. By contrast, all regular sports activities at any level in the USSR are attended by qualified medical personnel.

Even on the U of T campus, with its own service (even if you're on OHIP you still pay-no-one is a saying what the money is used for even though it is above and beyond the regular OHIP-scale fees) fail signally to provide full protection. Anyone who has ever tried to get help for an injured player at a night game appreciates the need.

Why can a country as rich as Canada not provide better care for its athletes? When we want to badly enough we will. Maybe if some of the sports moguls suffered the agony of seeing their own children hurt because of poor attention, the situation would be rectified.

Women hold sport workshop

By JANICE MCKELLAR

The University of Toronto participated in the annual Women's Athletic Association workshop held at the Ontario Athletic Leadership Camp last weekend. Waterloo hosted the program, which was attended by participants from Guelph, McMaster, Mohawk and Sault College, Queen's, Western, Wilfred Laurier, Windsor, York and Toronto. This year marked the first time that representatives were included from community colleges.

Waterloo created a very informative and innovative program for the delegates. The greater part of the weekend was spent exploring the relationship between the intramural and intercollegiate activities. Representatives were given a set of "diplomacy" game sheets and divided into discussion groups. The object of the exercise was to co-operatively develop an athletic program for a hypothetical institution within a specified budget of $25,000.

Through this exercise, the groups experienced the problems encountered in directing a women's athletic program. Every one learned the difficulty of scheduling and budgeting for a program which would meet the needs of all women on campus.

The workshop also featured a sports quiz and orienteering. The weekend concluded with a campfire and sing-song.

The U of T sailing team won the sloop series this weekend at Royal Military College. Skipper Chris Haines won the series with a first and a second to RMC's second and third and Queen's first and third.

In the dinghy series Toronto only managed a third behind RMC and Yale, with Queen's and Trent bringing up the rear. Ian Brown of Toronto won the A division of the dinghies while RMC captured the B division.

At the end of the first two season meets Toronto has managed two seconds. As a result it is tied for first place in the overall standings with perennial contenders RMC and Queen's. Last year the Blues sailors won the title in easy style; this year it looks as if they will have more difficulty in repeating the victory.

The next meet will be on the coming weekend in Oakville, with McMaster University as hosts.

Sports women suffer unfairly in male world

By MARY KEYES
adapted from The Silhouette

As president of the Canadian Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Union during the past year, I have become very conscious that in many ways the female athlete on our Canadian campus is indeed a second-class citizen. Furthermore, I am willing to hazard an educated guess to suggest that the problems which I shall discuss briefly in this article are not peculiar to women's university sport, but rather pervade their entire sport scene. The issues of which I have become most aware may be grouped under the following headings: (1) the athlete versus the female, (2) the female non-achievement syndrome, (3) sexism in sport, (4) financial discrimination.

The athlete versus the female

There is ample historical evidence, as well as the more recent research data, to suggest that women are anatomically and physiologically capable of participating in a wide variety of sports but culturally the attributes of a woman athlete have not been consistent with the ascribed role of the Canadian female. For too many years, games and physical skills have been associated with achievement and aggressiveness, which seems to make them the exclusive province of males. If an athlete is to be successful, therefore, must she be a lesser female? I think not!

At the university, there is not only conflict of roles between the female and the athlete, but there is also conflict in athletics. The chasm seems deepest and widest between the "rough and tough" team sports participants and the "leotard" group, the dancers and gymnasts. Such stereotyped images must disappear if women are to enjoy sport, and more importantly, to enjoy the sport of their choice. A sport cannot be classified by gender—a sport is neither masculine nor feminine, the door is masculine or feminine.

Athletes, such as Karen Magnussen, Olga Korbet or Nancy Greene do much to change the image of the woman athlete; but all too soon, the athlete image is taken over by the public appearance image.

Each of these athletes followed disciplined regimens, each of their sports demand strength, aggressiveness, determination and certainly achievement, yet no one would deny their femininity. Perhaps instead of advertising Mars bars, a better television role for Nancy Greene would be her practice schedule, her falls, her repeat runs down the slope the dawn-to-dusk toil involved in becoming a champion. We need more of this kind of feedback for aspiring athletes, and perhaps then the general public would take a different view of the female athlete.

The female non-achievement syndrome

One Chicago incident went something like this—a town was running the traditional soap box derby and at the start were scores of little boys and one little girl. They were off. At the finish, sliding in ahead of all the others, was the little girl. When presented with her trophy, she sobbed: "I didn't mean to win."

Unfortunately, this myth is passed on to little girls at an early age. The message says, lose the game rather than the boy! As a result of such conditioning, the female athlete goes to great lengths to disguise her athletic prowess. She will participate in socially acceptable sports such as tennis, swimming, figure skating, diving, skiing, golf, all of which have aesthetic, social and fashion appeal.

Some such comments were said in jest, but they reinforced the cultural expectation of women and the women as athletes.

We need to make demands on our women athletes; this non-achievement syndrome has pervaded women's sports for too long. It has been rationalized as sportsmanship and social interaction with oranges and milk after the contest; we have been fostering situations to disguise the demands of athletic participation. We must throw away the sugar-covered pill and emphasize the demands of intercollegiate competition for women. McMaster women athletes are training,

If you make a conscious effort to analyze the approach used in sports journalism, you will be amazed at the trite sexist garbage which is fed to the consuming public. Sports Illustrated is one of the worst examples of male chauvinist journalism. The article "Beauty and the Beast", made Robyn Smith into a fairy princess rather than the jockey she is.

they are playing well and most important, they are enjoying the experience.

Sexism in sport

Sports clothing manufacturers and the mass media are having a "hey-day" with the recent increase in interest in women's sports. Advertising has convinced many would-be sportswomen that a sports wardrobe is essential to participation. The colours are beautiful, the fit perfect, and price astronomical. As mentioned previously, a woman participates in sport for the social, as well as the physical, benefits, so she feels compelled to look her best.

Why do most male sporting events have cheerleaders and drum majorettes as part of the entourage? The whole cheerleader component of sport is one which I find depressing—it is exploitation of the female I would much rather see the cheerleaders working to improve their skill in a gymnastic environment than performing mediocre skills to appease a football or basketball crowd.

Financial discrimination

Men's intercollegiate sports on university campuses have been accepted for many reasons as being more prestigious than the women's programme. The football, the basketball and the ice hockey team are thought to raise the level of school spirit.

When raising money for the FISU games team which the CWIAU sent to Moscow this summer, I received a donation of $200 from a well-known Canadian bank. I was enthusiastic as our contributions were doubled with this cheque. I happened to attend, about the same time, a meeting of the CIAU. On their agenda was the distribution of a $25,000 donation from the same bank.

My purpose in citing the above example is not to demand equal money for the women's programs, but rather to illustrate the accepted discriminatory practices which occur daily. Sportswomen have not been as conscious of this financial discrimination as they might have been. They have not been as vocal as they might have been. But times are changing.

More interest will be shown in budget allocation, and in the discrepancies between the practices of the men's teams and women's teams. Less will pass unnoticed in the university athletic scene, because the professional sportswoman is making her demands known—she is serving as a discontented model to her university sister.

Physical strength and skill may be components of some, but are not their primary identifications. She will wear attractive sports clothes, curl her hair prior to competition, even though it will straighten as soon as she commences her event! She will be especially careful of her dress when she is not competing, because the "jock" image follows her social events if she is not extremely careful.

Sports standards are male, and the woman in sport is compared with men rather than with other women. For the teenage competitor, the demands of training and competition, plus the social problems involved in bettering her boyfriend in sport, the male bastion, is just too great a price for many. Girls must be taught that sports are life compartments, or roles, which society offers the individual to add to life fulfillment.

When we were planning the first co-ed national swimming championship, there were many comments which strengthened by awareness of this issue, but some were beyond belief:

- A male coach commented that women didn't swim as well as the men, so shouldn't swim in the same meet.

- A woman coach wrote asking for a special practice time so that her girls wouldn't have to go in the pool with the men.

- Another coach added that a few good-looking bodies walking around the pool would enhance the meet, but probably slow the times.

Jewish prof slams Israel

By DAVID LIPTON

In a speech on Wednesday night sponsored by the Arab Student Association, Dr. Norton Mezvinsky, Professor of History at Central Connecticut State College, argued that the "dezionization" of Israel was the key to solving the Middle East problem.

"The Zionist character of the state of Israel," he argued, is "the fundamental problem in the Middle East." Mezvinsky characterized Zionism as a secular Jewish nationalism that was exclusive, discriminatory and anti-democratic.

Mezvinsky, who is an active member of American Jewish Alternatives to Zionism, opened his speech with a reference to the Jewish high holidays. As a Jew he felt it appropriate that his lecture be delivered on the first day of the Jewish new year because it was the time of year that each Jew is supposed to inspect himself, and to reflect on his own shortcomings.

In the spirit of the religious holiday Mezvinsky urged Jews to reflect on the shortcomings of a Jewish nationalism that he said has brought so many troubles to the peoples of the Middle East.

Mezvinsky stressed the "expansionist character" of Israeli Zionism. Immediately after the 1967 war Israel argued that peace negotiations depend on Arab recognition of the existence of the state of Israel. Since that time Arab nations, such as Egypt and Syria, have publicly and officially announced their readiness to deal with Israel. Yet the Israeli position has shifted over to stressing the need to hold on to defensible borders, he contended.

The new Israeli demand for militarily "safe" and defensible borders reveals the intransigent character of Israeli diplomacy, Mezvinsky argued. He noted that Israeli military strategists, like General Pelé, are well aware of the "absurdity" of this demand. Given the state of contemporary military technology

(i.e. the existence of long ranged missiles) "safe" borders were a myth. The only "safe" border was one agreed upon by all sides.

Mezvinsky's conclusion was that Israel does not want to ever give up those newly acquired territories.

Aside from pointing to the actions of the Israeli government to support his contention, Mezvinsky noted that shortly after the 1967 war the two chief rabbis in Israel publicly stated that "any giving up of Israeli occupied territory would be a sin."

"Why is Israeli Zionism expansionist in design?" he asked rhetorically.

He believed the answer to this question lay in the concept of aliyah, a concept central to Jewish nationalism. Aliyah is the belief that all Jews should come back to Israel.

The preface to the law passed by the Knesset (the Israeli parliament) in November 1952 to administer the aliyah noted that it was "the central task of the state of Israel to bring Jews back to Israel." Hence, the existence of the law of return which entitled any Jew to come to Israel to claim Israeli citizenship.

The implication of Mezvinsky's argument was that Israel wants to hold on to the newly conquered territories for future Jewish immigrants. When pressed on this point he said that Israel's expansion was not necessarily related to future Jewish immigration.

Mezvinsky stressed Israel's need to maintain the demographic superiority of the Jews in the Israeli state. Hence Zionist laws favored the immigration of Jews to Israel in an attempt to maintain the exclusive character of the state.

Further, while favoring the immigration of Jews to Israel, the Zionists discriminated against the Arabs who had lived in Palestine before 1948 and those that were born there after that date, he argued.

In so far as it discriminated against the Arabs, Zionism was anti-democratic in the basic sense of the word. The Arabs did not possess rights equal to the Jews living in Israel. In fact, the rights of native Arabs were not even equal to the rights of those Jews who never lived in Israel before but later came to Israel.

Mezvinsky offered what he said was a concrete example of Zionist discrimination against the Arabs. The Jewish National Fund which controls 90% of the land in Israel will not lease any land to the Arabs.

Since the exclusive, discriminatory and anti-democratic character of Zionism was the major obstacle to a settlement in the Middle East, Mezvinsky called for the destruction of the Zionist state.

Dr. Mezvinsky urged "dezionization" of Israel.

However, he made it clear that this did not imply the expulsion of the Jewish population. Rather, Mezvinsky favors eliminating the principle underlying the Zionist character of the state of Israel.

Arguing from his desire to end injustice, Mezvinsky said that he did not want to destroy the Zionist state just to have it replace by an Arab version of Zionism.

Rub-a-dub-dub who runs pub?

By PAUL McGRATH

SAC appears to be heading back into the beer business, after the U of T administration decided Tuesday they would not be interested in running a university-wide pub anywhere on campus.

The impetus for "a centrally-located pub" came last spring after a report from a task force on Student Services set up by the Governing Council's Internal Affairs Committee. The report called for proposals for a campus-wide pub to be considered by Business Affairs with regard to cost and a suitable site.

According to SAC Services Commissioner Seymour Kanowitch, U of T Administrative Services then "picked up the ball" and started to move on a location in University College, only to find it unavailable.

At the same time, SAC was working on their own pub. It ended up that both bodies were bidding for the same place, the storehouse on Engineering territory.

After both parties met, there was a recommendation made for a co-op pub, to be run jointly by SAC and the administration. As SAC did not feel that the administration should be making any more money from the students, the idea was turned down. According to Kanowitch, SAC "spent the whole meeting trying to tell the administration why they shouldn't be in the pub business."

Kanowitch feels that the only reason the administration was interested in the idea at all was for the good public relations it would create between students and administration. He said the profit was "minimal" and felt it would be worth their while to operate a beer concession. Also, pubs in the past have been traditionally student-run and SAC feels they should remain that way.

It wasn't until Tuesday, though, Alex Malcolm, director of Administrative Services gave up the idea of running the pub and handed the works over to SAC. SAC will come up with a proposal that will eventually be processed by Business Affairs.

Strike not artistic

By BOB BETTSON

Every morning for the past five weeks a persistent group of striking workers and supporters have been waging a bitter battle against strike breakers and Metro police at two Artistic Woodwork plants in North York.

Metro Police have now made 46 arrests, most on charges of mischief or obstructing police because of attempts by picketers to harass and prevent strikebreakers from entering the plants.

The union, the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union, has failed to gain anything more than a 65 cent hourly raise in more than three months of negotiations. The company has refused to discuss the critical issues of seniority in hiring, firing and promotion, management rights and union security.

Yesterday morning only one person was arrested, U of T student Tim Gallagher, who the police said damaged a car of strikebreakers. A Varsity reporter on the scene saw police pick Gallagher for no apparent reason from a group of picketers who were trying to prevent a car from entering the Artistic Woodwork's smaller Regis Street plant.

The same two policemen had already escorted several other cars of "scabs" through the two groups of about 20 picketers at the plant's two entrances.

Earlier at 6:30 am the picketers had gathered at the Artistic Woodwork's Densley Street plant and the main group stayed for about fifteen minutes before quickly departing for the St. Regis plant about two miles north. Shortly after their arrival at the St. Regis plant a police cruiser appeared. On previous mornings at the Densley plant there have been up to 20 police helping to move the strikebreakers across the picket line.

Each time a car arrived the picketers surrounded it and shouted "scab, scab" at the occupants inside. They also banged on and rocked the cars. Some of the strikebreakers were visibly shaken.

However the police were able each time to push a path for the vehicles through the line in spite of the demonstrators' resistance. The scene was witnessed by the manager and several strikebreakers standing outside the plant.

Police reinforcements arrived at the St. Regis plant only after most of the cars had gone in and most of the picketers then dispersed leaving a small group of strikers to maintain a token presence.

One picketer said that there would have been many more arrests if more police had been on the scene.

Three of those arrested earlier are still in Don Jail pending the results of an appeal to the Ontario Supreme Court today. The three strike supporters, Mark Golden, Ray VanVnoche and Ron Mazur, refused to sign papers that would prevent them from going within 150 feet of any of the plants. The judge told striker Mazur that the only condition which he could come within the 150 foot limit was to work there or in effect to break his own strike.

According a picketer John Lang support is growing for the strike, and pickets are being maintained at the Don Jail as well as the two plants. He told the assembled picketers that the labour relations board hearing on Monday had "gone so well that the company had to put its own lawyer on the stand," a member of one of Toronto's top corporate law firms Mathews Linsdale. The hearing has been postponed for a month.

Summerhill founder dies

A.S. Neill, pioneer British educator and founder of the free school Summerhill, died last Sunday at the age of 89.

As an educator Neill advocated a freer education system where self-determination, independence and democracy were encouraged in a liberal atmosphere. His progressive, independent school founded in 1924 was regarded as avant-garde for many years because of its emphasis on personal freedom.

How have Neill's ideas affected Canadian education?

Ward Six school trustee Dan Leckie acknowledges the impact of Neill's ideas. Independent schools in Ward Six such as Contact and SEED employ many of his principles, meeting the needs of the students and eliminating formal discipline.

SEED co-ordinator Bob Beardsley notes that SEED is a direct descendant of Summerhill. The initiators of the project were adherents of Neill's philosophy.

SEED in its turn has been instrumental in the creation of other independent schools in the Toronto area, such as the Subway Academy. However, these schools are alternatives within the public school system and are responsible to the Board of Education.

Throughout its long history, Summerhill has suffered through many attempts to have it closed for various "infractions," such as allowing the students to swim nude on the grounds of the school. Neill's tactics and writings outraged many at the beginning and were the cause of much worry among more formalized British educators.

Neill had a long friendship with others among the vanguard of British and European educators, including Maria Montessori and the late Bertrand Russell. Russell and Neill exchanged long correspondence on educational theory, found in Russell's autobiography.

We put the control in birth control.

There's no faultless method of contraception. Not because some of the methods aren't perfect. But because most people aren't. U of T has no monopoly on poor food

Swill maybe, but by gosh, the price is right

By SHARON GENNINGS

Are students ripped off by the food vendors on campus? When it comes to food, quality may vary from place to place, but prices are at much the same level all over the campus.

In many places the same items cost the same price, even though the caterers may be different. Hot dogs, for instance, cost 35¢, wherever they are sold. Hamburgers cost 40¢ at Innis and Trinity, and 45¢ at Vic, New, Hart House's Arbor Room, and the Engineering Cafeteria.

Sandwiches range from 30¢ (peanut butter, at Vic) to 85¢ (jumbo-size many-layered, at Hart House). The average is 40-50¢, and usually depends to some extent on the sandwich's ingredients.

Juices, milk, coffee, tea, and pre-packaged desserts and snacks are generally standard in price.

There are some variations in price, however. Fruit sells for 15¢ at New, 18¢ at Vic, 20¢ at St. Mike's, and 25¢ at Hart House. Salads range from 15¢ to 30¢, at the above-mentioned places, and salad and meat plates sell for 75¢ at the Engineering Cafeteria, 85¢ at the Roberts Library, and $1.00 at Med Sci.

French fries, donuts, and milkshakes are other commodities whose prices vary with geography.

For the jaded—or corroded, if you live at New or Loretto—palate, there are some surprises (at low prices) to be found in unexpected places. New has ice cream cones for 15¢, in three flavors, and Innis, for 20-25¢, will give you your choice of venetian vanilla, chocolate, run-and-rasin, cherry vanilla, spumoni, strawberry, and Irish coffee.

The Roberts library snack bar serves "Schneiders" pre-packaged but very edible-looking hot spaghetti, steakettes, and macaroni per 75-95¢, and beef pie for 35¢. Vic has fruitbread for 20¢ a slice. MedSci sells half a grapefruit for 25¢. Innis and the Engineering Cafeteria sell slices of pizza for 40 and 50¢ respectively. Hart House (Arbor Room) boils eggs for 20¢ each, and Trinity's "The Buttery" sells long, sliced dill pickles for the tiny price of 5¢.

Some may complain, for example, that 40¢ is still expensive for a low-quality hamburger. These people should go down to Harvey's, on Bloor, where they can get the same kind of food for 15¢ more. Institutions have no monopoly on poor food.

Lead-poisoned air popping up everywhere

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

Since last year, when citizens in Toronto's Niagara Street area began the fight against a local metal refinery which recycles lead, the problem of lead poisoning in inner city areas has received much publicity. Most recently an article in the Toronto Citizen exposed a new area of concern—a Toronto Riverdale community which is threatened with lead poisoning from the Canada Metal Co. Ltd. plant on Eastern Avenue. Wednesday night a meeting was held at the Queen Street Presbyterian Church to discuss this new issue.

The meeting included over 100 delegates from the Greater Riverdale Organization, Alderman Paul Pickett who is chairman of the Metro Board of Health, Dr. David Parkinson from the Sick Children's Hospital, and two Department of Health inspectors with little to say. The issue discussed was a sobering one—the fact that neighbourhood children run the risks of high lead levels in their blood from a number of polluting factories in the Riverdale area, particularly Canada Metal.

GRO delegate Norma Detwyler, involved with the action against Canada Metal, made a motion, which was passed unanimously asking the following:

1. That blood tests be conducted by the Board of Health, with the assistance of the Board of Education and GRO in the local schools. These tests would be completed by October 16.

2. That the Board of Health then meet with residents to discuss the results.

3. That the Board of Health ask the Buildings and Development Committee of City Council to prohibit construction of an 85 foot stack at Canada Metal to protect the health of the Riverdale residents.

Jim Vezina, a delegate from Canada Metal who has worked closely with GRO in the past, replied that Canada Metal was not polluting at the present time, and was currently meeting all provincial safety requirements.

Doug Bryson, Canada Metal plant manager for the Riverdale area, agreed, and pointed out that any evidence of high lead levels would have been cumulative, since the plant had been operating in the area for fifty years, presumably before the dangers were known, and pollution control devices installed.

Vic votes (barely)

In a rare burst of political consciousness, Victoria College students yesterday almost doubled last spring's turnout in the VUSAC elections.

Yesterday's VUSAC elections drew 306 students, or 12 per cent of those eligible to vote. Most of the voters who turned out live in residence at Vic.

Topping the polls in the vote for Services Commissioner was John Morgan, who got more than three times the votes of his nearest rival, Mike Stratford.

Acclaimed as Finance Commissioner was Michelle Harvey.

The new members-at-large are Julie Mizen, Beverlee Ritchie, Janet Davis, and first year students Alan Brencley and Tim Lowman.

Dr. Parkinson, one of six physicians who conducted blood lead tests in the Niagara Street area, tentatively promised to assist residents with this issue.

Effects of lead poisoning vary from relatively minor symptoms, such as nausea, headache, dizziness, and loss of appetite, to partial paralysis, and tremors of the speech and hands. Very high levels of lead can cause irreversible brain damage, Dr. Parkinson said.

Two basic types of testing can be done, Parkinson stated, one which is free, and administered with materials from the provincial Ministry of Health and one which is analyzed by a private agency, and costs $7 per test. This last test is easier to administer to children because it involves a smaller sample of blood.

The consensus of the meeting was that Dr. Parkinson and his team of doctors should meet with residents as soon as possible to set up a testing program. If financial assistance is required, it will be obtained from City Council, with or without the prior approval of the City Board of Health.

And the City Board of Health, chaired by Pickett, will probably approve this proposal, since they have always supported Parkinson's group in the past, particularly in the Niagara Street testing. However, Pickett was unwilling to make any commitment in this regard and preferred to relate long, involved stories about his cousins up north, which did not appear to be relevant to the issues at hand.

Dents propose fee

By CHRIS DRISCOLL

Topics under discussion at Tuesday's meeting of the Academic Affairs Committee of the Governing Council provoked little debate among committee members.

Most of the questions before the committee's second meeting this year were of a routine nature. In closed session the committee considered the quality of the members who had been nominated for the positions of Subcommittee Chairmen.

The only proposal to receive much debate was that of the Faculty of Dentistry to charge a $10 application fee to cover the cost of streamlining admission procedures and to purchase computer time.

Several objections to this plan were raised, primarily questioning whether this would set a precedent for other faculties to follow. Faculty of Law professor J.B. Dunlop pointed out that many students apply to several schools for admission and that such a fee would pose a serious problem to them. The question was referred to the Subcommittee on Awards and Admissions for further consideration.

Dare to struggle

A group of employees at Dare Foods Ltd., in Kitchener have applied for decertification of the United Brewery and Cereal Workers as its bargaining agent after a bitter 16 month strike.

The application was considered at a September 19 hearing at the Ontario Labour Relations Board, and will be reconsidered on October 4.

The Board has yet to define who is in the bargaining unit, and therefore who is eligible to vote for decertification.

According to United Breweries regional director Norman Wilson, the board will also consider evidence that the employer helped the decertification process. According to law, employer involvement in this process is illegal, and would disqualify the application for decertification.

The Dare strike began in May 29, 1972, when workers of Local 173 of the union voted 97 per cent to reject a 25-cent-a-hour wage increase. The union was looking for better working conditions.

In its efforts to break the strike and the union, Dare foods brought in professional strike breakers, when truckers refused to cross picket lines.

There have been repeated picket line clashes, and damaged property. The union has also been fined $1,500 under the Ontario Labour Relations Act for an ad campaign in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record that accused the union of not helping the company or company employees.

Of the 375 employees who walked out, about 100 have returned to work, another 125 are still on the union strike rolls, and others have gotten work elsewhere.

Meanwhile, the boycott of Dare cookies continues. In the last three or four weeks, the union has sent out 100,000 leaflets to revitalize the campaign.

This beautiful variety of baked goods should not be on your grocer's shelf.

Parity forgotten, but not gone

Take a liberal issue,
Put it in a pie,
Screw a liberal student,
Get it in the eye.

One of the saddest impressions we've had about the university so far this academic year is the lack of understanding by most first and second year students of the meaning of the word parity. This might be expected from an institution whose members fall into the transitional category, but we feel there are still some students (student leaders?) around today for whom the parity issue might mean something.

To some of us parity equals the right of equality. For those who weren't at this university to participate in past struggles for parity, we'll briefly fill in some of the recent history.

Parity first became an issue on this campus with the report of the Commission on University Government in 1968. Composed of four students, four staff, and (then) president Claude Bissell, the report recommended changes on all levels of the U of T governing structure.

Four faculty members, elected openly and democratically by the same faculty who now so strenuously oppose parity, actually participated in proposing a co-operating academic community with parity governing structures. The nine people on the Commission on University Government went through a unique educational experience in formulating the report — an experience which led them to trust and respect each other as human beings. The experience also led them to a co-operative position rather than a position where each body (student, etc) would be confronting the others.

And it's important to note that the CUG report (as it soon became known) was not a majority report, but a unanimous report. It was trying to create in the whole university exactly the same process and experience the members of the commission themselves had gone through in formulating the report.

The parity issue was first settled in the spring of 1970 with the defeat of student attempts to gain equality on a new restructured Faculty of Arts and Science General Council. And the attempt to gain parity on the highest governing body in this university — the Governing Council — was defeated on the floor of the provincial legislature in the early summer of 1971.

The legislature debate showed where the real power within the university lay — with the faculty. In 1971 the new U of T Act was passed, enshrining the dominance of staff over students in university structures.

One could ask the question: why should students have parity? One of the best replies is contained in an article by Gary Webster, a student member of the 1968 Commission on University Government. His article, entitled "Students are neither children nor barbarians..." — the case for student parity — served as a basis for discussion within the Commission.

Webster assumed the following facts in presenting his argument — assumptions which he gained through experience in university government and education. First, "the university is not now primarily a place of freedom but rather a place of conformity, authoritarianism, and training rather than learning for the vast majority of students; second, that staff are not employed primarily for their qualities as 'helpers in the learning process', but rather on the basis of the conservative criteria of a classic guild whose major purpose is self-preservation and self-perpetuation; third, that the primary interest of most staff members is not teaching but status, salary, comfort, and professional advancement; fourth, that students are neither children nor barbarians to be civilized, but are sensitive thinking adults, whose range of experience is different than, often more limited in range than, that of the teacher, but is not necessarily less valuable in the academic world for all that; and finally, that the "utilitarian" vision of the university held by some faculty members as the ultimate horror is in fact an accurate description of the socializing role played today by the university".

Webster then wrote: "The rhetoric of academic freedom and academic competence is a mask for just this sort of 'community of scholars'. While the present university is the capstone of training elites and their professional sidemen, and inculcates values which tend to alienate the 'properly finished' student from the bulk of the population, the good university must be democratic in aim and form.

"Its product should be a man with healthy (i.e. not elitist) attitudes toward all of his fellow citizens; with a capacity to think critically about his environment and his society, and to analyze the role which his work plays in helping or hindering the improvement of that milieu.

"He should be a man who never takes the constituted authority's professions of wisdom at face value when he has the time, the interest, the personal resources to check up on its assertions.

"Given such a prescription for a good community, there arises the question of the relationship of student involvement in teaching, hiring and promotion to the achievement or approximation of such a goal. In the ensuing discussion, equality with staff is assumed as a minimum requirement for the creation of the proper learning environment.

"Free and equal men exist only in a context of equally shared power to shape the environment. After a transitional period in which the entire educational atmosphere is transformed, and teachers again become interested in teaching, the principle of equality of every staff member to every student will be perfectly acceptable.

"In the transitional period, the principle of equality is best expressed through the instrument of parallel structures. The dangers to development of free men posed by a student elite are nearly as great as those created by the elitism of the faculty: thus mere parity on decision-making committees must be rejected. Joint-negotiating committees responsible to the two constituencies would work out details of agreements.

"Beyond the department level, parity on committees is the only workable solution. After the transition period, the principle of one-man-one-vote should be implemented at all levels — although a representative mechanism will be needed beyond the classroom and departmental levels.

"There is no reason at all why must devolve onto policy committees based in the parallel principle and ad hoc selection committees where decisions are made by representatives (rather than delegates).

"There is no reason at all why students cannot get access to the same information presently available to staff on hiring committees — if the chairman and others with relevant information will provide it. Teaching ability must certainly can be assessed here — and there is an available student input from many other universities.

"... In the case of promotions, the argument for equal involvement of students on a parallel structure basis is very strong. It is admitted by our most frank academics that they really know nothing about their colleagues' teaching performance. Yet the case against student involvement is usually based in arguments about the students' ability to judge one's professional contributions.

"... The most telling argument in favour of student involvement in hiring, promotion and tenure is the far greater tolerance of the young for new and challenging ideas. While the professional establishment has a vested interest in perpetuating the values and methodology demand which is the source of its livelihood, students are interested only in approaches which appear to clarify the subject matter and bring it into a comprehensible context."

But this mood among new, incoming students is changed now. Idealism has been replaced by pragmatism in most active students (those that are left to remember CUG). Among the student body this year, the mood is one of withdrawal from personal commitment or active involvement. We sympathize with the students who fail to see the Governing Council as a legitimate body through which to express their dissatisfactions and ideas.

The recent decision to seat only three students out of a total of 15 on the committee to review the U of T Act (the review was promised as a compromise measure when the Act was first passed in 1971), and the failure of the Forster Report to provide any structures for student input at all, let alone on a parity basis, shows us exactly what the university administration and faculty think of the student body. Nice people to co-opt (and the word is being used without any sort of negative feelings by many students) but don't give them any real power to make any decisions that affect their lives.

Only through parity can students fulfill their legitimate role in the university. Any other compromise measure should be rejected. We only serve to legitimize the university as it now stands through accepting its benevolent, paternalistic attitude toward students. After five years of fighting we're still second-class citizens in this community.

Socialism doesn't prevent fascism

Your call for student leftists to condemn Soviet oppression is laudable—even if long overdue. I hope you eventually have the courage to criticize the vileness and inhumanity of the Peking regime and other governments in the socialist camp—many of which are more vicious and tyrannical than right wing regimes that you criticize.

By the way, Marxist dogma and socialist ideals are no preventatives to tyranny and oppression. In fact, there's a cogent argument that those with socialist ideals unintentionally pave the way for fascists to come to power—see The Road to Serfdom by Friedrich A. Hayek.

I doubt that capitalism is the root of all evil, and even so far as to suggest that the market economy benefits all classes. To justify such heresy on my part, all I can say in this brief space is "read"; avoid the clichés of the right, but also be wary of those of the left. Such a policy may not endear you with your party, but you'll come out ahead—whatever your conclusions.

Soviet repression a Cold War myth

During the 1950's many liberals in Canada and the United States learned out of fear to protect themselves from right-wing attacks by surrounding any progressive opinion with an attack on the socialist countries, particularly the Soviet Union. This fearful response helped reactionaries by dividing progressive people. During the past few years the Cold War has become much weaker and the possibility of united actions against reaction and repression has again arisen. In light of this change, it was disappointing to find the Varsity editor trying to defend himself from the right-wing on campus for his excellent and well-researched coverage of Chile by an ill-informed and thoroughly Cold War attack on the Soviet Union, and, through his cartoon, on the entire socialist system.

The editorial in Wednesday's Varsity perpetuates one of the most vicious myths of the Cold War: the myth that fascism and communism are similar "totalitarian" social systems and equally worthy of condemnation. This myth has always been a slanderous insult to the 20,000,000 - (one out of every 10!) - Soviet citizens and to the thousands of communist partisans in Europe who gave their lives in the fight against fascism during the Second World War. It is equally slanderous to the tens of thousands of communists who have sacrificed, and who continue to sacrifice, their lives in the fight against fascism in Spain, Greece, Portugal, South Africa, Rhodesia, Brazil, South Vietnam and around the world. But the perpetuation of this Cold War myth by the Varsity is particularly grotesque at this moment when thousands of Chilean communists, along side of socialists and other democrats, are heroically risking their lives in the struggle against fascism in Chile.

The Varsity editor would be well-advised to take a careful look at his allies in his new campaign against the socialist countries. The recent "concern" over civil liberties in the Soviet Union is directly related to the fact that imperialist countries are increasingly being forced to accept Soviet proposals for detente between East and West. Even that greatest of all Cold Warriors Richard M. Nixon is trying to present himself as the architect of detente. Only the most reactionary circles in the West refuse to accept the inevitability of peaceful co-existence and are finding themselves increasingly isolated in their attempts to prolong the Cold War. In an effort to make an unholy alliance with liberals, these reactionaries are suddenly displaying a great interest in personal liberties and they do manage to receive occasional support for old time's sake from such papers as the Globe and Mail and the Toronto Star. These new-found defenders of civil rights are the very people most pleased about the military coup in Chile and are the greatest supporters of US aid to fascist regimes around the world.

The Varsity editor tries to present his argument from the perspective of the left but in fact he does not define the terms "socialism", "communism", "imperialism", or "ruling class" and uses them in a way which has nothing in common with standard socialist usage. He glibly asserts that the Soviet Union is not a socialist country but nowhere provides any information to prove that the ownership of the means of production is in private hands or that a new form of democracy, based on the workplace, is not in existence. He assumes that any opposition within socialist countries is left-wing by implying that the same classes are in power in the socialist countries as in the capitalist. He seems unable to make the elementary distinction between a capitalist society in which a handful of financial interests use the power of the state to exploit and repress the majority and a socialist society in which the workers and farmers use the power of the state to ensure that they get the benefits of their own labour. Illiteracy, lack of cultural facilities, high infant mortality, inadequate diet, unsanitary housing, etc. etc., are rampant in countries like South Africa, Greece and Brazil, not in the socialist countries.

It is impossible in a letter to deal with all the implications of the Cold War views contained in the Varsity editorial. The U of T Communist Club last year published a pamphlet dealing with some of the most widespread Cold War lies about socialist countries and pointing out the growing convergence of right and "left" wing criticisms of existing socialism. This pamphlet is available at the club table in the lobby of Sid Smith. We are sending a copy of this pamphlet to the editor of the Varsity in the hope that he will read some of the books recommended in it. Our wish is that future editorials on socialist countries will be based on the same kind of careful research that obviously went into the articles the Varsity carried on Chile.

Barbara Cameron, President
U of T Communist Club

Challenge to left accepted by RMG

Wednesday's editorial, which challenges the left to take a serious approach to the defense of Soviet dissidents, was well taken. While we in Canada have a more direct responsibility to expose and combat the crimes of internationalized capitalism, into which Canada is fully integrated, this by no means allows us to abstain from involvement with struggles in that part of the world which has removed itself from the control of the imperialist economic bloc. The fight to re-establish workers' democracy in the Soviet Union (factory councils, regional soviets, full democratic rights for workers and peasants, etc.) is a fight for the overthrow of a conservative bureaucracy which is an obstacle to the extension of the gains of the Russian Revolution. The adoption of the slogan "All Power to the Soviets" by striking Eastern European workers in recent years is a precedent. This struggle is more than a moral imperative within the strategic necessity for the advance of the colonial revolution and the workers' movement under advanced capitalism, and for the realization of socialism on a world scale.

The Trotskyist left has always fought against the parasitic bureaucracies of the Stalinist regimes. The Fourth International, through its analysis of the three sectors of world revolution, has placed this fight in the context of an integrated socialist strategy.

Here in Canada, the Committee in Defense of Soviet Political Prisoners, which arose from Toronto's Ukrainian community, is campaigning for the release of Soviet dissidents like Ivan Dzyuba and Vyacheslav Chornovil. The Revolutionary Marxist Group will continue to cooperate with the Soviet Defense Committee in the struggle for socialist democracy, as well as explaining the problems of bureaucratic repression as a result not of "communism" but rather of a particular form of degeneration within the workers' movement, namely, Stalinism.

U of T denied Yorkies' goodies

Sir:
The government of Ontario has introduced a pilot program to provide bursaries to needy part-time students at "a number of Ontario universities and colleges of applied arts and technology", beginning this fall. Alas, U of T part-timers, the goodies (up to the amount of tuition and related fees plus a supplementary grant of up to $150) go to York students, but not to us.

I phoned the Student Awards Branch of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, to be told "that the committee considered the geographical situation and number of students in surrounding areas oh, extremely carefully". "Didn't York's thirst for fresh students play a part in the decision?" I asked innocently. "Oh, no, there was nothing political involved in the decision," came the reply.

Monopoly is the name of the game, isn't it? Do not pass Go. Do not collect $200

VUSAC elections encourage apathy

In Wednesday's "Varsity", Vice student president Brian Gazley ends an article on the VUSAC election by lambasting students who criticize the council after failing to vote on that annual event. Surely you would presume from Mr. Gazley's comments that the Council organizes a campaign which is so compelling in its interest that Vic's students will flock to the polls to make the key decisions which well affect their academic lives.

Unfortunately, this is not the case. This early in the year, how can first year students, for example, possibly be oriented well enough to find the best candidates from among their midst? As for the candidates themselves, the grand total of one - (count 'em - one) platform from all the candidates does not present the greatest of choice to voters - nor does it lead them to believe that the election is important, even to the candidates. Needless to say, there have been, as of this morning, no advertised public meetings or any such forum in which a proper assessment of the various candidates could be accomplished.

As a first year student, I have already met up with incompetence in the Vic administration, which promised me a place in residence and then "abracadabra!" - revoked the pledge when they found they were, as they delightfully put it, "overbooked". It should thus be no shock to me to find the same combination of ineptitude and arrogant self-righteousness in the top echelons of the student body. To please Mr. Gazley, I intend to dig up (probably with some difficulty) the information as to where the election is being held and cast a ballot - a spoiled one that is, to protest this farcical travesty of the democratic process.

Grange area residents pressuring OHC

Family housing to be saved in Hydro block

By TIM PINOS

For the past four years, residents of a community just to the south of the U of T campus have been fighting two government-controlled corporations to save 42 low-income residences from the wrecker's hammer.

Even though Ontario Hydro, original purchaser of the property, sold out to the Ontario Housing Corporation eight months ago, the majority of these houses remain locked and boarded up, rapidly decaying from lack of attention.

The fate of these houses, which comprise the block bounded by Beverley, Cecil, Baldwin, and Henry Streets, is as yet unknown, for OHC has not reached a decision on final plans for rehabilitation-renovation and eventual full occupation.

Four years ago, Ontario Hydro assembled the land contained in this block, now popularly known as the Hydro Block, intending to build in place of the houses a massive twelve-storey transformer. Citizens of the area, realizing how incompatible and detrimental this structure would be to the surrounding low-rise community, immediately protested. It was not, though, until August of 1971 that Allan Grossman, Revenue Minister and MPP for the area, told Hydro to build elsewhere, that the site was saved. The houses on the block would be sold to OHC for "practical" rehabilitation, with a citizen's committee given the opportunity to guide OHC policy.

However, it was not until January of this year, when the Hydro block was finally sold to the OHC, that serious planning began. Since then, the same citizens that helped prevent construction of the transformer are attempting to influence OHC policy regarding plans for redevelopment.

The Hydro Block Working Committee, which is working on behalf of the community, is composed of voting representatives of nine Grange Park area groups. The purpose of this committee is to analyze and reach a consensus on their desires for the block.

At a meeting last December 7, the Hydro Block Working Committee hammered out a policy statement which defined guidelines for development of the block. The primary goal, according to the statement, has been the "maintenance of this block of a residential environment and community similar to that which exists in the surrounding neighbourhood".

The committee recommended that the housing be available at rents and prices which suit the low and moderate-income families of the community, with first priority being given to present Hydro Block and other south-east Spadina residents.

Since last March, the working committee has been negotiating with the OHC through the Technical Steering Committee, which is composed of two Hydro Block representatives and several people from OHC, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and City Hall.

Before buying the Hydro block, OHC hired the firm of Diamond and Myers to act as architectural consultants for the Hydro Block. Last April 12, at a meeting of the Block Committee, Diamond and Myers presented a feasibility study which consisted of six design alternatives. It is around these six "schemes" that discussion and argument has since centred.

The first three of the Diamond and Myers proposals were quickly set aside as being unsuitable for the neighbourhood.

The fourth proposal was based directly upon the desires of the community and has been recommended by the block committee as the best alternative.

All of Schemes Four, Five and Six entail the retention and renovation of the houses along Beverley, and a new housing development in place of the houses on Henry Street. Scheme four has the lowest density, a total of 108 units and hostel space. The types of dwelling units are roughly equal in number ranging from bachelor apartments to five bedroom apartments, with a small number of six bedroom units.

Schemes Five and Six, on the other hand, have higher densities (141 and 173 units, respectively) and a far less equal distribution of housing types, with fewer large-family dwellings.

The committee considers very important the fact that these houses be made available primarily to people of low and moderate income. However, according to OHC calculations, this would be impossible in the case of the larger dwellings.

The policy of the OHC is not to pay subsidies above $150 per unit, per month, which would make dwellings more than one bedroom in size unaffordable to those in the $4,000 income bracket.

OHC provides that an OHC tenant must not pay more than one quarter of his/her annual income in rent (which works out to about $75 per month for a $4,000 income). The OHC subtracts this amount from the normal rent of the unit and will subsidize the rest, as long as it does not exceed $150. In the Hydro block, subsidies of up to $400 are required to make larger apartments available to low-income families under Scheme Four, Five, or Six.

Over the phone, OHC official Frank French said that regardless of which scheme was chosen, a break in OHC policy will be necessary to allow greater subsidies, a break which will not come easily. The block committee has proposed that the OHC "write-down" the value of the land, which would allow the OHC to exclude the land in unit-cost estimations, resulting in cheaper units. Another possible solution is to look to the federal and provincial governments for more subsidies.

Whatever the final decision, it will be made by the OHC board of directors, a group which has been unwilling to allow representatives of the Hydro Block Committee to make deputations at meetings where the block was being discussed.

The Technical Steering Committee has recommended to the board of directors that Scheme Four be approved. It does not seem that a decision will be reached in the near future, although at this Wednesday's meeting of the OHC board representatives of Diamond and Myers and the Hydro Block committee will be present.

While the decision-making process drags on, concern has been raised over the ability of the houses on the block to withstand another winter unrehabilitated without serious damage. The majority of these houses have been uncared-for for four years, and the possibility arises that the houses on Beverley which are to be retained may have already decayed too far to be saved when renovation finally begins. This prospect makes quick action even more imperative.

Even though the physical aspects of the Hydro Block are as yet unresolved, members of the committee have begun to address themselves to the role of the tenant once the block developments are finished. Having seen many area residents get involved in saving the block, committee vice-chairman Kay Parsons would like to see tenants have a strong say in the actual management of the block.

The first questions, though, Parsons said are "do people want to become involved, and how do you encourage tenants to participate and make it a good place to live?" To this end, a survey will be taken to determine the attitude of area residents to tenant participation.

Parsons is emphatic about the need for OHC to listen to what residents have to say, because co-operation between tenant and landlord can be for the good of both.

Regardless of the final outcome of the Hydro Block project, the vigorous concern which residents of Grange area have shown regarding the block issues can be used as a lesson for any organizing community.

The block committee has brought the diverse elements of the Grange community together in a co-operative unit, leading to good communication and rapport in the neighbourhood.

In fighting for the retention of much needed low-rise low-income housing, residents of the area have gained the support of many individuals and organizations, on the municipal, provincial, and federal level, and showed that ordinary citizens can do battle with the higher-ups on an equal footing, occasionally even winning.

The saving of the hydro block represents not only the retention of a few houses, but could lead to a continuing active say by the members of the community in the planning and management of the Grange.

However, the residents of the Grange will not be able to point to any concrete victory until the first low income residents move in to the new dwellings on Beverley, Cecil, Henry and Baldwin Streets.

Looking for the silver that's just not there

The silver stops under the greywacke say the experts but the people of Cobalt (2,200 strong) know better. They continue their search for a hidden vein of silver that will re-create the boom town of the original strike. In between moments of activity they talk about the good old days, gossip and dream awhile.

Theatre Passe Muraille's cross country explorers of actuality drama spent the summer in this 'cradle of Canadian mining' absorbing the feel and texture of the area and the voices of its people. This is what they bring back to us with Under The Greywacke.

Like The Farm Show, which gave us an inside view of the small rural community of Clinton, Ontario, this work builds on day-to-day actualities, the work and play of the community and the eccentricities of some of the local characters. In The Farm Show the anecdotes and individual highlights were both complete pieces and part of the total portrait which was Clinton. The sustained feeling was of an on-the-scene informality and a shared exchange of experience - the farm folk with the theatre group and the theatre group with us.

The major difference with Under The Greywacke is that the people are pre-occupied with a common myth striking it rich and creating a great tourist mecca - which is less adaptable to a theatrical form attempting to synthesize a wide range of impressions. We tend to receive a repetition of the same rather than the choice vignettes of The Farm Show. The physical structure of the stage in Holy Trinity Church also prevents the intimacy between scenario and audience possible in the old Theatre Passe Muraille building. This is perhaps the most significant detriment to the new work, removing our interest from the particular problems of these people.

Even so Under the Greywacke captures the essential idiosyncrasies of the situation it explores and gives us a sense of personal introduction to the new friends which Paul Thompson and his troupe discovered in Cobalt - the lady who bakes pies but is undersold by the supermarket, the scrap-metal dealer, the two men who get lost in the woods and many more. And one of the unique talents of this group is its ability to depict not only real people but also an entire environmental milieu using only themselves. They take on the characteristics of trees, animals in the forest, a train or a screeching car as easily as they do the characters of the town.

This innovative blend of free association, mingled with song and direct explanation to the audience, produces the special familiarity of a lived experience. In the end it is the lived experience, shown with humour, sympathy and understanding, which becomes the dominating feature of Under the Greywacke.

Lazing with a sultry Ravel

Ravel: Le Tombeau de Couperin,
Valse Nobles et Sentimentales,
Une Barque Sur l'Océan
Pierre Boulez/New York Philharmonic
Columbia, list $5.98

This week's best is the ideal record to laze around with on a rainy afternoon. It's the sultry, melodically fascinating work of Ravel, who was the last of the school of musical impressionists, a school that lasted an astonishingly short time.

All the works on the record are transcriptions; that is, Ravel rewrote his own music for orchestra from the original piano score. To make this come off, demands a huge amount of technical skill and an understanding of the orchestra and its tone colours which borders on the incredible. The best-known of Ravel's orchestrations is "Pictures at an Exhibition", transcribed from Mussorgsky's set of piano pieces of the same name. So good is the orchestration that the original piano pieces are virtually unplayed today.

Pierre Boulez is the new conductor of the New York Philharmonic, filling the not inconsiderable shoes of the now-retired Leonard Bernstein. As if that task wasn't hard enough, he's also trying to change the playing habits of the orchestra - and the New York Philharmonic is not exactly noted for its willingness to change. Boulez, however, is no stranger to opposition. In his younger days, he was one of the fieriest of the angry young French composers, and it was only with great reluctance that he began to conduct conventional works.

In many respects he's the ideal conductor for this music, because the tremendous drive of his youth is still present. At the same time, an undeniable mellowing has taken place in his personal approach to the music. The result (along with his formidable intelligence) is a combination of skill and emotion not heard on a record in quite some time.

This is the second of his records of Ravel, following a successful series of Debussy programs. These piano-based works sound very much at home in the orchestra. The Valses, in particular, have a dynamic sweep and power unlike anything else in Ravel's orchestral repertoire. In the composer's tribute to the classical French musician, Couperin, Harold Gomberg easily makes the oboe solo a free-floating, delightful episode.

The recording is almost noise-free, and for once it's a pleasure to report that the pressing arrived in relatively good shape. Clicks, pops and scratches are something that we all have to live with, but when a new record is opened and it's too warped to play, that's a bit discouraging. Happily, this record is flat as a pancake.

In the excellent liner notes, Mark N. Kanny reports that Debussy said "Ravel's are the finest ears that ever existed." It probably isn't far off the mark to say that Ravel's are the finest that ever existed for Ravel's music.

Badger burrows to its own style

"One Live Badger"
Badger
Atco/WEA; $6.29

Badger and a group called Flash are both offshoots of the British band Yes. But while Flash got bogged down trying to imitate the energetic complexities of Yes' music, Badger, under the leadership of Tony Kaye, wandered off and developed a style of its own.

Their first album, One Live Badger, was recorded live at the Rainbow Theater, in London. It's a very polished and enjoyable effort showing that the four-man band is skilled and well controlled. There are none of the usually obligatory dull solos so evident in most live albums. Kaye, playing organ, mellotron and synthesizer, provides the band with a good background and lead sound without drowning out the other instruments.

Brian Parrish, on lead guitar, plays in a wailing Southern blues style that sounds like it was borrowed from the Allman Brothers. Unfortunately his licks tend to be repetitive.

There are six songs offered on the album. Side one is made up of slower, bluesier (in the British sense) tunes, and the flip has three good rocking numbers. Best cuts are "On the Way Home", "Wheel of Fortune" and "River". The singing is weak at times, but then it is a live performance and all such efforts have problems of some sort.

They're not the Stones or the Who but Badger does sound a lot better, on their first record, than the Stones or the Who did on theirs. Also, the LP was cut nine months ago and who knows what has developed since then. I just hope they get to do one in the studios.

SWEAT AND URINE

Neruda of Chile is dead

For Chile, it seems, it is truly a time of plague. With an estimated 10,000 already dead resisting the fascist coup d'etat, another blow has come in the form of the death of Pablo Neruda. Although his death, unlike that of so many others, came from cancer, not from the guns of the military, you may be sure that the generals nonetheless welcome his death. Should there be news of eulogies at the graveside of this communist and personal friend of the murdered Salvador Allende, remember these lines that Neruda wrote in 1948:

they say to me: 'What a great man you are, Theocritus!'
I am not Theocritus: I took life, and faced her, and kissed her and won her,
and then went through the tunnels of the mines to see how other men live.
And when I came out, my hands stained with garbage and sadness,
I held my hands up and showed them to the generals, and said: 'I'm not a part of this crime.'
They started to cough, showed disgust, left off saying hello,
gave up calling me Theocritus, and ended by insulting me and assigning the entire police force to arrest me, because I didn't continue to be occupied exclusively with metaphysical subjects.

... and they want to lock me in a cricket cage, where there would be tears, and I would drown, and they themselves could give speeches on my grave.

Neruda was a man who passionately mixed poetry and politics; a diplomat, Senator, and long-time member of Chile's Communist Party, he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1971, and was generally regarded as one of the greatest poets of the Spanish language.

His achievements at poetry were greater than his practice of politics: a man who could join the Communist Party after the purge trials of the 1930's can hardly command our complete affection and respect. Yet his stature as a poet is unassailable, and this not despite the fact that he was uncompromisingly political, but because of it. To suggest, for example, as the Chicago Surrealists, a group of rather tiresome manifesto-writers, have recently done, that Neruda is a "hack", is to display, not an understanding of the unity of politics and poetry, but a complete ignorance of both.

This is not the place for a thorough evaluation of Neruda: a writing career that spans over half a century does not lend itself to that. He sought to write poetry "smelling of lilies and urine". In reading what he wrote of love and struggle, a younger generation of Latin American poets may go beyond him, but they will also respect him.

Below, one of his 'political' poems: They receive instructions against Chile But we have to see behind all these, there is something behind the traitors and the gnawing rats, an empire which sets the table, and serves up the nourishment and the bullets. They want to repeat their great success in Greece.

Greek playboys at the banquet, and bullets for the people in the mountains: we'll have to destroy the flight of the new Victory of Samothrace, we'll have to hang, kill, lose men, sink the murderous knife held to us from New York, we'll have to use fire to break the spirit of the man who was emerging in all the countries as if born from the earth that had been splashed with blood.

We have to arm Chiang and the vicious Videla, give them money for prisons, wings so they can bomb their own populations, give them a hand-out, a few dollars, and they do the rest, they lie, bribe, dance on the dead bodies and their first ladies wear the most expensive minks. The suffering of the people does not matter: copper speak not only passionately, but with feeling for language.

All this is quibbling, however, when set beside the force of some of the poetry in this little volume. You read it and know that the reign of the generals in Chile, in Paraguay, in Brazil, can't last.

It's been shown that in Latin America, contrary to accepted theories, middle class rule and military coups complement each other. One of the main reasons is that, unlike the situation of most of the more industrialized nations, in Latin America the ideological and cultural sway of the ruling classes is much less complete. The claim of the rulers to represent the interests of all of society is much less widely believed. And the introduction of some measure of democracy, such as elections, threatens the power of the middle classes (a small minority of the population). Since other arms of the state such as education, are much less fully developed, and where they exist are often dominated by leftists, the middle classes come to rely on military force to retain their position. The coup in Chile is an example.

But it's not possible to rule by force forever. An elite that can't command the loyalty of its Nerudas, its young poets and writers, its students, not to mention its workers and peasants, may be sure that it's days are numbered.

To the generals who now rule Chile, a last defiance from Pablo Neruda. The lines were written 35 years ago, but, with the word Chile substituted for Spain, they might have been written yesterday:

*Jacksals abhorred by the jackal!
Spittle of stones that the thirst of the thistle rejected,*

*Vipers despised by the viper!
In sight of you now, I have seen Chile uplifting its blood in a torrent*

of knives and defiance, to carry you under!

*Turncoats and generals:
see the death of my house,
look well at the havoc of Chile:
out of dead houses it is metal that blazes*

*in place of the flowers, out of the ditches of Chile
it is Chile that emerges, out of the murder of children, a gunsight with eyes,
out of your turpitude, bullets are born that one day will strike for the mark of your hearts.*

Would you know why his poems never mention the soil or the leaves, the gigantic volcanoes of the country that bore him?

*Come see the blood in the streets, come see
the blood in the street, come see the blood
in the streets!*

Lucky Man has sense of its own absurdity

"Try not to die like a dog" Ralph Richardson mutters enigmatically to Malcom McDowell in O Lucky Man. McDowell survives and grows wise by undergoing much suffering. That's a very old story that Lindsay Anderson is telling in his new, long film, but he's interested less in the hero-patient than in the world that causes him such tribulation. O Lucky Man is a broad, picaresque saga set in a half-Dickensian, half-Orwellian England, which Anderson sees as staunchly capitalist and to hell with the slick socialist veneer.

McDowell plays a young coffee salesman on the make called Mick Travis. Travis motors through the north country, his auto full of paper pouches of coffee that he munches dry, like granola. In his bright-eyed zeal to get ahead, he ends up in some strange places and predicaments: in an atomic-energy plant, which fortuitously blows up while he is being interrogated as a spy; in an experimental clinic where a messianic doctor grafts human heads onto quivering, porcine bodies; in a genteel country hotel that features a clandestine bunny club specializing in live-sex skits with names like "chocolate sandwich"; and in the heart of London's financial district where prepared obituaries in bound volumes are at hand in case disgruntled employees choose to hurl themselves from skyscrapers (which one does, taking with him for the plunge a good samaritan who tried to restrain him).

Travis, the perpetually smirking second banana, reaches the apogee of success as private secretary to the owner of that skyscraper, the richest and meanest man in the world who protects his investments in some corrupt African country by supplying its government with "honey" — a vesicant that seems a cross between napalm and mustard gas used as the ultimate anti-guerilla weapon. Unknown to Travis, his duties include being scapegoat in the event of a mishap, and so the expected reversal of fortune occurs as neatly as any Aristotelian could ask.

Anderson punctuates his parable with maliciously droll touches, like baffling anecdotes told over port at a ritzy dinner party at which guests laugh with hearty insincerity. Or like a prison warden, who looks adoringly at Travis, "rehabilitated" after a five-year term for fraud, and tells him "I can see you stripped, building roadways. You have eyes like Steve McQueen."

As you've surmised, O Lucky Man is not a subtle movie, but neither is it simple-minded. Lindsay Anderson is up to some dextrous (or is sinister the better word?) juggling. Between episodes, the story stops and we find ourselves in a recording studio where Alan Price and his band sing songs commenting on the action. (Price, by the way, has the most outrageously appealing smile imaginable, and his music sticks with you). Then again there are the reminiscences of It..., which get quite explicit before the movie is over. The film's most striking conceit, however, is that each actor plays three of four different roles. The major stars like Rachel Roberts or Ralph Richardson are identifiable, but less familiar ones in walk-on parts are harder to keep track of. During much of the movie, in fact, you are liable to be conferring with your neighbors as to who is who and what was he or she playing before. Anderson, I think, must have intended this; between us and his blatantly biased story he has interposed a screen, a puzzle. Taking a leaf from the old master Brecht himself, he keeps distracting us from the lessons he supposedly wants us to learn. Anderson is doing something extraordinary — he is putting out propaganda with a sense of its own absurdity. Which, despite the carps of the already committed, may be the most winning propaganda of all.

Clockwork orange pekoe: this violence has style

People who haven't seen any Kung Fu movies still feel pretty confident about putting them down. After all, one can imagine them saying, they're just like all those Italian westerns only worse. That is more or less what I thought when I first heard of them.

It is fair to compare them to the epics of Sergio Leone: both unabashedly exploit the commercial appeal of violence, and both display the same simultaneous reverence for and parody of genres of movie that have developed into mythologies. The significant difference is that they are different mythologies. The Western myth is the glorious story of how a bunch of tough boors moved into all that wild and beautiful landscape you see behind John Wayne's left ear, resisted the onslaughts of its unfriendly aboriginals (and of their fractious colleagues), tamed it, and eventually replaced it with downtown Las Vegas. Its Oriental opposite number (I don't pretend to know enough about it to parody it) is set in a long-established and intricately structured culture, in a country that is so heavily populated that people have to be very polite to one another in order to co-exist at all.

Out of this social milieu comes (on foot) our hero, played with martial artistry by Bruce Lee, who has attained that emblem of archetypal status usually only awarded to the stars of eponymous television situation comedies: he gets to play a character with his own name. He is dispatched by the Oxford-accented forces of good to a tournament hosted by a Mr Han, in order to investigate that gentlemen's activities, which include martial arts, heroin production and marketing, white (and yellow) slavery, and guillotining white cats. Throughout Lee maintains several times as much dignity as Clint Eastwood, without once having to resort to inscrutability.

Like most epics, Enter the Dragon does not deal with characters, but with archetypes, or at least upwardly mobile clichés. Jim Kelly portrays a socially committed black athlete: he embarrasses you every time he opens his mouth, but somehow you really feel sorry when he is beaten to a pulp by a tinheaded scag baron amid the cheers of a roomful of happy smackies. Also on hand are Ana Capri as the ghost of Rita Hayworth, and John Saxon as Jack Nicholson.

But after all the movie's prime concern is with violence. Though it is sometimes difficult to tell where one fight sequence leaves off and another begins, there are at least nineteen (including one between praying mantises), all stunningly choreographed and staged by Lee. Unlike the violence dished up to us in such Critically Acclaimed works as A Clockwork Orange or The Wild Bunch, this gives us no opportunity to secretly indulge our bloodlusts because it is stylized to the point of ritual. At the same time, it is more impressive because it's real, by golly, they're actually kicking each other in the balls! There are no Statements about the Nature of Violence: English majors will be disappointed; instead we are shown some violence and left to judge for ourselves.

And finally we judge that there is a bit much. It is great fun to watch, but after the first few movies' full, it would probably begin to get monotonous—except of course to a connoisseur of Kung Fu, which, unlike trigger pulling, really is an art. The rest of us will hope that they will come to rely less heavily on dazzling spectacle and develop more fully their other aspects.

Because all the Kung Fu movies to have appeared in this country so far have depended so heavily on Lee's talents, it is difficult to know if the genre will survive his loss. He died last August, at the age of thirty-three.

Memoirs of a gentleman of the opera

The Variety—Joshua Koon

By BRIANE NASIMOK

The unsung heroes of any opera company are the supernumeraries or "extras". They're a highly trained band of mute performers, responsible for such important tasks as removing dead bodies, attending at parties, carrying on and off props, waiting at dinners, bearing flags and serving at soirees.

I am an extra.

Why, you may ask, would anyone want to be an extra. The reasons vary. Some are great lovers of opera; others devout exhibitionists.

I have discovered that I am somewhere in-between.

THE BIG BREAK

I first became an extra to satisfy one of my unprintable boyhood dreams — to perform on the O'Keefe Centre stage. Since tothold I had dreamed of playing on the stage of the "barn that beer built", and working with the Canadian Opera Company, or COC (pronounced coc) gave me my big break.

After numerous rehearsals at U of T's Edward Johnson Building, the company finally moved to the O'Keefe for an open rehearsal — in costume and make-up. An open rehearsal is like a performance — audience in the house, orchestra in the pit, and me coming on stage.

The Big Time

On a given cue, I was to enter, playing the part of an elegant gentleman in Lucia de Lammermoor the part being a theatrical challenge. As I entered, the chorus turned to greet me, and accept my gifts to Lucia, a bride-to-be. The orchestra crescendoed. But as I triumphantly strolled down centre stage, the director screamed from the back of the audience "You walk like a penguin."

After such an emotional setback I recovered enough to perform in two other operas that year, The Merry Widow, and MacBeth. In the former my job was to wait throughout the first act in case any glasses broke on stage. (It happened three times). I would then inconspicuously slip on stage, with a little brush and pan in hand, clean up the breakage, and make a hasty, but dignified exit.

"Macbeth" was my artistic triumph of that year. I played four separate parts in that one production. Besides being both an English and Scottish soldier (changing sides gave me a motivation problem) I was also a waiter, and branched out to be a twig of Burnan Woods.

As a wood I was given a number of styrofoam tentacles and instructed to dash across the stage. That was Burnan Woods. However the part was valuable training for my later appearance as a "Mischievous Tree" in the opera schools production of a Prisoners Play, a children's opera which the author said was about the Vietnam war, although nobody knew it was. The Globe and Mail (another Toronto paper) found my characterization so rich and rewarding that it described me as "a cousin to Big Bird, twice removed."

THE BIG BUST

After the Toronto season the company packs two shows and travels to Ottawa for a glorious fun-in-the-frost week.

Ottawa is blessed with the National Arts Centre, a beautiful complex with a real opera house. The only problem is that it is located in Ottawa and not in Toronto.

The final day in Ottawa was set aside for our traditional Opera Bowl, a touch football match between the extras and chorus. Instituted three years ago the game reached national prominence when we were busted for playing organized sports on National Capital Commission Property.

It seems that you are not allowed to play games in certain areas of Ottawa. Due to our ignorance, we decided to play the game on a field next to the Arts Centre. In the middle of the third quarter, four squad cars pulled up. Ottawa's finest, not knowing what was going on, stopped the game, and informed us of our illegal tactics. We were asked to leave, and did so. The victory was given to the extras.

THE BIG DEAL

Every year, a select 20 tour with the company through exciting places to put on approximately 96 performances of the same show.

The tour is la creme de la creme. You might say it's where it's at.

As soon as I saw my first dress rehearsal of a tour production, I knew I could not be content in Soc and Phil but had to spend my life performing, spreading a little joy to such remote places as Seagrave Ontario. Alas, there was no part for me, so I went back to classes and waited my chance to fulfill this another personhood dream.

After a stellar second year with the company (last year), I went places. I was asked to be in charge of the extras (affectionately known as king of the extras).

Power. But I wanted more. I went to talk over my salary with Dr. Herman-Geiger-Torel, the general director of the COC. He asked me what I wanted.

I spit it out — the tour. He paused, eyed me up and down; I palpitated.

"We'll see," he said.

Two weeks later, I saw. I was in; I could tour. Really the big time.

THE BIG CONFESSION

Why, you may ask, did I write this riches to rags success story (I know the editor asked me why)? Was it to show how one large boy, a Sagittarian optimist struggled up the ladder in the entertainment field to the pinnacle? Did that have to fill up space in the Review section that badly? Is this just one large commercial for this year's opera season, in which the author happens to appear in The Merry Widow, Fidelio, Rigoletto or is it a preamble to weekly stories he may send in while on tour beginning November 6? Who knows?

Who cares.

Brian Nasimok was The Variety's sports editor from June 30, 1973 to July 1, 1973.

Death, violence, and Stanfield keep you rolling in the aisles

Cabaret style revues are definitely "in" in Toronto these days - some musical, some with music. The revue format is an eminently designed weapon for taking pot-shots at moving targets. It allows you to load, take aim, and fire on the run before anyone can shoot back. Of course no one fires back; the minute you turn around you are off on another target or maybe simply the same target but at a different angle. All three revues in town make good use of the shifting angles and dissolving focus of satire, burlesque, and parody.

If you have not yet taken note of the amount of violence vocabulary in the first few sentences of this article, then a concert in E flat major for Piano, Drums, and Violence at Harold's Stage Door is just the thing you need. The Trust Company's Michael Rapport, Vinetta Strombergs, Stephen Witkin and Jank Zajman review "the most ubiquitous and consistent energy of man from biblical days to this plastic age", i.e. violence. A life in the days of man is so violence studded and most of us have so taken it for granted that we have allowed violence to permeate our most innocuous conversations. (I'll kill him; She stabs everyone in the back; You kill me, etc.) We educate and violence-inoculate our children even as we entertain them. Take for example the nursery rhyme:

Graphic: Rivers Bend Review

Three blind mice...She cut off their tails with a carving knife...

Fun eh? Not to forget everyone's favorite, Little Red Riding Hood, or what exactly happened to Humpty Dumpty.

The Trust Company summed it up in their parody of Sesame Street - Seamy Street, where A is for artillery, armament, aim and annihilation. Violence as they so ironically demonstrate is entertainment. We only object to it when it interferes with our golf game; when the car hurtled off the road immolating both itself and the next green. If there is a message in Piano, Drums and Violence it is that you will probably die laughing.

They may be correct if one of the funniest of the sketches at the Second City Theatre is anything to go by. Poor Eddie has just passed away after getting his head stuck in a giant economy size can of beans. His manner of death leaves me wondering how Jayne Eastwood (his wife) manages to relate it with a straight face. While the bereaved but stalwart widow tries to control her embarrassed son's annoyance, those who come to console end up convulsed. It is a paradigm of all those special social situations where laughter is simply unthinkable. Of course the more you think about it the more you laugh.

And the more you think about it the more Second City's cast list is beginning to look like the roster of the Who's Who of Godspell fame. Jayne Eastwood, Glida Radger, Gerry Salsberg and Eugene Levy all hail from Godspell and have branched out into Second City's improvisational and relaxed atmosphere. Together with Dan Ackroyd's 'Do-tel' record salesman and Valri Bromfield's Dottie of Dottie's Drive-In (a la 1950) the cast's duty roster covers everything from a slow-motion football video replay to a sophisticated "Pirandello" sequence in which the lines of reason dissolve at each touch. Here the take off is on the fine lines between fantasy and reality, madness and sanity. The ensemble book show is usually very good and Valri Bromfield occasionally makes it superb. Miss Bromfield can carve character out of marshmallow.

The Second City located at Jarvis and Adelaide is fast becoming one of those spots in town where you are never quite sure who is sitting next to you or who will walk in from their own show at some other theatre to catch the eleven o'clock (free) improvisations after the regular show.

Although Second City is here to stay, you only have until the end of October to catch Dave Bradfoot and Susan Keller upstairs at Old Angelo's in the Broadfoot directed and produced, Take a Beaver to Lunch - a series of satirical stabs at everything and anything Canadian, which is a type of reverse nationalism that borders on light and delightful treason not prejudiced by any partisan respect. If it is Canadian it is topical game - fair or foul. One moment, Broadfoot's Trudeau in a magnanimous just-society gesture, tells us if the flood waters remain in our living rooms for ten days, they're ours; while the next minute Stanfield stammers through a series of his own pauses.

Take a Beaver to Lunch is a light, light, fast-paced musical revue. If you have been treated badly by Canadian life lately, and want to get some of your own back, Mr. Broadfoot and the lovely Miss Keller are just the people to do it for you.

Al Kooper's high-powered band shows southern bohave promise

"Lynyrd Skynyrd"

Sounds of the South/MCA; $6.29

Al Kooper (not Alice) is the kind of musician that you have to sit up and take notice of. His credentials as a songwriter, musician and arranger are well known and impressive. He began his career as a founding member of the Blues Project with whom he explored what would now be termed progressive rock-jazz or blues at a time (pre-1965) when folk music was in its heyday. Not being satisfied with that group's sound, Kooper moved on with another Project member, Steve Katz, to set up the first of the rock big-bands, Blood Sweat and Tears. Taking on the role of lead singer, composer, arranger and keyboard player, Kooper was the primary force behind BS&T's first album. But the new group had other aggressive members who thought the musical direction of the band should be more jazz influenced in opposition to the rock-orchestra concept of Kooper. So Al left to work on solo albums.

Between now and then Kooper has made his musical mark as a session artist for Bob Dylan and the Stones as well as with the incomparable "super sessions" he recorded with guitarist Mike Bloomfield.

Kooper's latest project is the formation of a new record company called Sounds of the South, for which he's been handpicking talented rock bands from the Atlanta, Georgia area. His contention is that the best rock he's heard in years is coming out of the south and he wants to bring it out in the open.

Lynyrd Skynyrd, a seven member band is the first product of the Kooper SOS project. Its composition is a bit unusual in that it uses 3 lead guitar players — which makes for some soaring high-powered guitar styles which are pleasingly artistic and executed with surprising economy (a Kooper touch, no doubt).

The album is well put together but I tend to find that several of "Honkey Tonk Women".

I've been most taken by an acoustic song co-written by Al Kooper, called "Mississippi Kid". The tune seems to smack of Ry Cooder, mostly due to the mandolin licks laid down by studio musician Roosevelt Gook. It also contains a beacon bright har-

the tunes (all originals and all composed by singer Ronnie Van Zant), have some striking similarities to other groups' material. The subdued ballad style of the Stones on "Wild Horses" and "Sway" comes through in a song called "Tuesday's Gone" while "Gimme Three Steps" blends a John Sebastian/Lovin' Spoonful type phrasing with the familiar whining guitar riff out of the Stones' monica solo by BS&T member Steve Katz.

The lyrics are thoughtfully printed out on the album and appear to be a distinct cut above the usual drivel that most bands pass off as an excuse for vocals.

Word is that Lynyrd Skynyrd have already written over 20 songs since this album was recorded. That's good news for you and Al Kooper.

"Our proud past" is mediocre rock'n'roll

Cantata Canada (Capitol - $7.98 List) is an attempt to create a viable rock musical ala Tommy based on themes and incidents which run through Canadian history. Part 1 of a two part effort, the present disc is the brain-child of self-styled media entrepreneur from the Prairies, Doug Hutton, and is promoted as 'being a nationalistic 'dream' which tries to 'bring about an awareness on the part of Canadians of the proud past' through rock music. It is also intended to be (and let's not forget it) a commercial venture. In fact, Capitol Canada is putting behind the project the greatest financial and promotional muscle in their history. Edward Bear never had it so good!

The record consists of a series of songs and narration of titles such as, "The Plains of Abraham", "The Great Depression Farmer's Lament", or "Klondike". The songs were created by various writers and composers from across the country, with the band, Privilege, supplying some collaborative material. The result is a mish-mosh of styles and viewpoints without any feeling of unified vision or thematic continuity.

Privilege has apparently been around for ten years or so in western Canada and the United States. Their last big gig was a successful western Canadian version of "Jesus Christ Superstar" which premiered in Winnipeg in 1971. They're basically your average bar band right from the singer, Mel Degen, to Harry Krawchuk on bass. You might remember the drummer, Penti Glan: he played with lead guitarist Don Troiano in the Toronto group, the Mandala and in Bush. He's a good drummer, but he's lost in the mediocrity of this group. Privilege is assisted throughout the record by members of the Vancouver Symphony, who are, of course, satisfactory.

Being as chauvinistic as the next man I really hate to put this super "Canadian" album down, but unfortunately it's going to be an expensive turkey for Capitol. It never gets beyond the level of a cross between a National Film Board documentary and a Labatt's "50" commercial: forty odd minutes of it. It's slick and well done in a very middle of the road way, but is so lacking in new and even minimally exciting ideas that it falls flat on its own pretensions.

Musically it's trite; poetically it's pedestrian and banal; from any standpoint it's dull. There's nothing wrong with the musicianship on the album, it's competent if uninspired. The problem is that the material is of such a poor quality. There's barely a striking line, scarcely an intriguing chord progression, and not even a good solid melody in the whole show. As an attempt to make big waves in the Canadian rock music scene it's a total failure, and it doesn't even come close in its avowed effort to produce an album deserving of international exposure.

Brewed from pure spring water.

And that's the truth!

Exhibition at Albert White Gallery runs to October 4.

Picasso show opens

The Albert White Gallery, 25 Prince Arthur Ave., has mounted an intriguing exhibition of the work of Picasso. The drawings, etchings, and lithographs, either through the luxury of selection or pure chance, comprise a fine representative collection.

Despite some divergence in style, the work, dating back to 1925 and including items from the brilliant 'Vollard Suite' (1931) as well as the more recent '347 Series' (1968), is so thematically and aesthetically consistent as to seem to encapsulate Picasso's creativity into a single fragment of time.

Picasso, more than any other, dissolved the distinction between the artist and his art, decimated the aesthetically imposed barrier that centuries had erected. His phenomenal success grew from his psychic agreement to be mythologized. The essence of the Picasso legend was that Picasso would simply be Picasso. To perceive his work is not to see a 'drawing', but to see Picasso. Themes and images recur, become archetypal; whatever is in his life becomes his art.

Picasso generates a powerful mystique. There is a charismatic lure to his image; the magnitude of his legend is itself magnetic, but its ingredients remain potent: the subconscious allowed free play, a purified sensuality permitted exhilaration. Picasso is at once in the vanguard of the modern, yet simultaneously evokes an older, more erotic, culture. He retains his artistic innocence — an imagination unrefined by the self-conscious process of intellectualization. The purity of his line creates its own dimension.

This important exhibit closes October 4.

"Heavy Traffic" suffers from lack of consistency

In these days of inflation, I tend to judge a movie by how much I would pay to see it, supposing I had already seen it, and knew what it was like as I do know, if you know what I mean. On that scale Ralph Bakshi's Heavy Traffic is an average film. I wouldn't pay $3.00 to see it, but then again I might sit through it with something else for 99¢ at the Rox, $1.50 (at the Revue) is my top price.

For one thing, it doesn't have a plot. Nine-tenths of the movie unfolds the fantasies of Michael, an unsuccessful twenty-two year old underground cartoonist, while he is playing pinball.

These fantasies are a compendium of pop images of the last fifteen years. We see Chuck Berry and his cars. 'As I was motoravation over the hill Saw Maybelline in a coupe de ville.' Michael sees his father as a small Mafia, and his mother as the Jewish mother. There is some fairly conventional blasphemy: Christ kills God because he's been conning us all again. A few science-fiction touches. Some fashionable homosexuality.

The trouble is, Bakshi doesn't do much with any of the fantasy elements. They are all lumped together for no better reason than because they are 'in the air'.

The same applies to the cartooning itself, though technically the film is very well-done. Several styles of cartooning are employed, most of them easily identifiable as the creations of other people. A sequence to 'Maybelline' is drawn à la Krazy Kat. Bakshi was at one time a Disney cartoonist (the phasing out of that side of the Disney Empire in the last few years put him out of work), so it is not surprising if a face, here and there, reminds you of Pluto or Uncle Scrooge.

There has been much notice taken of the level of violence in Heavy Traffic. Those who protest against Bakshi should take a look at the cartoons of Wilson, who is a big name in the underground strips, and friend of R. Crumb. Wilson's specialty is page upon page of lesbians fighting it out with pirates. As far as violence goes, S. Clay Wilson has Ralph Bakshi beat. Hammered. Into the ground.

Heavy Traffic as a whole needs an individual style badly. The most interesting aspect of the film is Bakshi's superimposition of reality, New York street scenes, on cartoons. If Bakshi makes any more films, and he probably will (Heavy Traffic is his second, following Fritz the Cat) perhaps this is the area that he can develop, as a step toward distinctiveness, as opposed to skimming the surface. chris probert

Bartok blooms

Bartok: Miraculous Mandarin Suite Music for Strings, Percussion and Celeste, London

Sir Georg Solti is, so London records tells us, the world's most honoured conductor. Whether this is advertising or fact isn't all that important, but certainly many thousands of classical fans would agree that he ranks among the very best conductors performing today.

He divides his time between the Chicago Symphony, Covent Garden Opera House, the Vienna Philharmonic and numerous recording dates, and he recently celebrated his twenty-fifth year on London. Quite a record.

One of the records issued to celebrate his anniversary was the suite from The Miraculous Mandarin by Bartok, along with that composer's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celeste. Originally released in 1964 on the Decca label in England, the record catches Solti in the last stages of his fiery virtuosity, a style that marked his recordings for nearly twenty years. I'm sure that if these works were done again today, his approach would be substantially different; far more emphasis on the lyrical and less on the excitement.

This record is no exception.

The Miraculous Mandarin is a violent one-act ballet, written in 1918. Perhaps the war had a direct influence on Bartok, because the music abounds in raw anger and machine-gun intensity. The story is one of three muggers who lure passersby into a room in the slums with a girl confederate. The first two who happen by don't have enough in their wallets, so they're thrown out. The third is the mandarin, who eerily frightens the girl. She tries to lure him by dancing, but when he runs to embrace her, she becomes scared and a chase ensues across the room. The thugs then rob the mandarin, and try to kill him by stabbing, hanging and smothering, but he won't die; only when the girl takes him in his arms does he bleed and die.

The work receives a splendid performance, full of life. The other work, the Music for Strings Percussion and Celeste, is divided for two string ensembles, with the percussion in the middle, making for excellent stereo placement. Again, Solti makes the swirling rhythms of the third movement sound truly Hungarian, based as it is on Gypsy style. The first movement, a languid, arching series of notes on the strings sound like water on still lake in the early morning. db

Metro Centre examined

By JOHN BUDAY

The Confederation of Resident and Ratepayers Association (CORRA) is planning to present a new set of proposals to Toronto City Council on the subject of the planned downtown-core development known as Metro Centre.

The development is part of the mammoth Toronto waterfront redevelopment planned over the next ten to fifteen years which already includes Harbour City. It will include hotels, a convention center, a shopping and an office complex, and will take up the 187 acres north of the Gardiner Expressway and south of Front St. between Yonge and Bathurst Sts.

There has been minimal public discussion of the development although proposals from CORRA have been presented before the Ontario Municipal Board. There is feeling that proposals may not be listened to, as a framework already exists for the development.

CORRA has been instrumental in leading the fight for citizen participation in Metro Centre decisions and has made specific requests and guidelines.

Key to their requests, which they will present Oct. 3 to City Council's Executive Committee, is the formation of a Citizen's Advisory Committee on Metro Centre. CORRA hopes the committee will be provided with a budget. CORRA vice-president Ellen Adams would like an independent title search on properties in the area. The findings, CORRA feels, should be made public before any further agreement is made between City Council and Metro Centre Developments Ltd. All this, they hope, will lead to public discussion of the future development of the centre.

CORRA is specifically interested in plans for 55 acres immediately west of Spadina which do not belong to the city. There is some doubt as to whether the land is owned by Canadian National Railways or the province of Ontario, although provincial ministers Dalton Bales and John White have indicated in the legislature that the land belongs to the province.

Finally, CORRA is attempting to obtain reports drafted by Metro Centre Developments and the Chief City Planner Dennis Barker, and make their findings known.

On a provincial level, CORRA is planning a conference of municipal ratepayers organizations across the province March 2 and 3 in Toronto.

CORRA feels that many problems of urban life are common to many groups in the province and some of the topics to be discussed will be the Ontario Municipal Board, regional government and the Ontario Economic Council.

Chile day organized

A day of mourning in reaction to the "brutal and illegal seizure of power by the military junta in Chile" is being organized by the U of T Committee for a Democratic Chile.

The committee, which met for the first time Wednesday, has already obtained support from the Graduate Students Union and the SAC executive for its organizing effort.

Teach-ins and other activities will be the focus of the planned day of mourning which will probably be held in the next two weeks.

Attempts are being made to get the U of T administration to cancel classes for a two hour period at mid-day.

Petitions are being circulated to put pressure on the Canadian government to deny recognition to the junta and support measures of censure in the United Nations.

The committee elected a steering committee which includes student governor Gord Barnes, SAC vice president Steve Moses, Innis principal Peter Russell, professor Meyer Brownstone, and Chilean student Alfonso Grau.

The committee is co-ordinating its efforts with the Canadian Committee for Solidarity with Chile which has been supported by a number of trade unions, the Voice of Women, the United Church, the Latin American Working Group and the Canadian Council of Churches.

An article in last Wednesday's Varsity about Crown Trust-owned houses on Sussex Avenue stated that Governing Council member James Joyce was a director of Crown Trust. He is in fact a former executive vice-president of that company.

The article also states that one of Crown Trusts managers was responsible for evictions of student tenants at 4 Sussex. Crown Trust had rented the house to a woman, who had in turn sublet it. This woman was responsible for not telling the student tenants they would have to vacate shortly several months after they had rented the house, to make way for Innis College's new-building.

In Wednesday's article, Who will get Queen's Park? incorrect editing had University capital budgets officer, K.S. Gregory saying the city had been maintaining Queen's Park since 1966. Gregory actually said that the province had been looking after the park since that time.

Defending champs upset in interfac openers

The 80th season of interfaculty football got underway Tuesday when perennial contender Vic outlasted Engineering 19-9. The early score was 6-6 and Eng seemed to be even on play, but the superior Vic experience gradually told. While the men from across the freeway seem to be much improved on last year, they still lack the weight and the quarterbacking to take the Mulock. Scoring was produced by Johnson Scott and Matsumoto with majors and Zimmerman with a single. Ross got Vic's lone TD, augmented by Balnis' single and a safety touch.

Dentistry's abrupt withdrawal held back the second division schedule one week. The editor shamefully admits that his predictions are already looking weak. The gnus have a large and enthusiastic team whose size could make them the heaviest in either division. Even though the new players are out of condition, UC and Meds will have a hard time staving off their challenge for the second division title.

In interfaculty soccer the season opener saw defending champs Sr. Eng. go down to defeat at the hands of St. Mike's, 2-1, on goals by Stastny and Bartolini. Pereira replied for the losers.

UC served notice that they are unlikely to make the play-offs as a weak Vic team took them 4-0. Jack Regan and Malcolm Williams each scored twice for Vic.

A heavy, powerful Jr. Eng. squad will threaten for the second division title, as they demonstrated in a 6-2 win over a short-handed Trinity A team. Plumbers goals came from Bill Gray (3), Karl Feiler (2), and Vince Chacinski. Dave Rose and Tim Parker countered for Trin. The division defending champs, Meds, kept it up by shutting out Law 1-0 on a goal by Jim Saffrey.

On Thursday an inexperienced but enthusiastic New 11 shut out Dents 2-0 on goals by Jackson and Burgess. Dents seemed too unaggressive to pose much threat to the division contenders.

Interfaculty rugby starts next week with ten teams in contention. Pre-season information is scanty, but look out for the red and black machine from Trinity!

The interfaculty track meets started this week with a huge turnout for the medley and sprint relays. Final results gave Knox a long head start on the title with wins in both events. In the medley they were followed by St. Mike's and Vic. Runners-up in the sprints (4 x 110) were Dentistry and Vic again. Next Tuesday again, and on Friday, the interfac meet.

Flash - late reports from the field indicate that defending Mulock holders SMC went down to defeat against PHE yesterday 13-10. Both teams suffered from lack of preparation for the game. PHE played as a unit for the first time due to their summer camp program, and came up with a cohesive effort.

St. Mike's moved downfield with fullback Larry Cline's hard running and foolish PHE penalties. After several exchanges they got close enough for Bill Chepsiuk to loop a field goal.

PHE started a return drive with the combination of smooth-tossing Paul Dennis and the fine running and catching of rookie Randy Kearn. Kearn finally rambled unopposed around left end to score the first PHE major, which was converted.

St. Mike's seemed to fizzle inside their own 25 yard line. Dennis' passing kept the backs deep and isolated the weakness at linebacker.

SMC quarterback Mike Engel frustrated the halting Phys Ed defence by recovering his own fumble and somehow homing in on his undefended tight end who was lumbering like a runaway Mack truck toward the end zone.

The quarter ended 10-7 with SMC backed to their own goal line and Ron Chiatery stripping three blocks to seal off a jock power sweep.

The second half featured Dave Mielach and Kearn working with PB Phillips to grind out long PHE yardage. Mielach finally went 45 yards around the corner on a pass to put the jocks ahead to stay.

St. Mike's kept trying, but the passing threat was too weak, and this blunted Cline's running. A last-minute block of a PHE punt gave them new lease on life, but they were unable to move quickly enough for the major, and a field goal attempt went short.

PHE tries to block St. Mike's punt in interfac season opener. Defending Mulock Cup priests lost 13-10 to tough jock squad.

Blue bomb Brock Badgers badly in soccer

By JOHN COBBY
The soccer Blues visited Brock on Wednesday and came away victorious by a 5-1 margin. The inability to transform offensive pressure into goals, which has plagued the club so far this season, was overcome with four goals in one half-hour period.

The match commenced inauspiciously with poor team play by both sides. The bumpy field conditions were much to blame since even accurate passes strayed wide of the receiver. Within minutes Geoff Crewe, on defence, had to leave the game with an ankle injury.

The hosts took the lead after 15 minutes with a goal born out of confusion in the Toronto defence. The Brock players showed their awareness of the vagaries of the playing surface by using long high balls to their forwards, aided in the first half by a following wind.

One such ball gusted past Herb Dubsky and bounced treacherously between him and goalkeeper Bob Judd, who had advanced from his net. Brock's John Kooistra hustled in, and when the ball bounced free it was in his favor; he promptly ended the confusion by hammering it home.

Toronto equalized the tally 10 minutes later with a surprising goal. Carmen Marcanonio, making his debut, hit a low free kick from 25 yards out. The ball bounced strangely and finally zipped through the hands of the diving Badger goaltender.

The team now started to adapt to the conditions and pressed forward. A dribble by Allen Caramancio could only be halted at the expense for a penalty; however, Joe Liscio blasted the kick just inside of the net.

With the wind in its favor in the second half, the Toronto squad planned to use the long lofted through-pass. Within one minute such a pass from Herb Dubsky was converted into a score by Caramancio. He leaped between the defensive backs and the goalkeeper to head a picture goal, and collected a temporary concussion to go with it.

The team finally seemed to have achieved some organization on attack with the abandonment of the ground ball due to the surface.

After 55 minutes Vince Ierullo received the ball on the edge of the Brock penalty area and faked a shot. Once the goalie started to dive he turned and fired the ball over his falling body.

Eight minutes later a right-wing corner kick by Peter Hillier found Vito Polera on the left. He centred to Ierullo who relayed it to Caramancio, who shot it home.

The final goal came at 74 minutes after Polera had collected a ball down the left wing. He drew a defender to him and passed off to Ierullo, who thus had a clear run to the goal.

The Brock Badgers attacked only spasmodically, their main threat coming from corner kicks. However, Judd, making his debut in goal, showed good judgement and safe hands in collecting the high crosses from among a crowd of leaping players. The other newcomer, Marcanonio, indicated his talent for accurate distribution and close control in tight situations.

While the win was gratifying, coach Bob Nicol noted that the opposition was weak and suggested that a better indication of progress might be served by to-morrow's game in Waterloo.

Free kicks...Groin injuries are the bad this year - captain Tim Burns missed the Brock game on this account. Ian Harris is out for the season, and Elvy Zanette obtained his very own in the first half... News from the north indicates the 1971 Canadian champions, Laurentian, are very strong.

Blues take RMC in rugby

By JAMES MacDONALD and GRAEME WYNN

Marital music from the parade ground heralded the start of Wednesday's game between Blues' rugby team and Royal Military College. The Toronto pack displayed cohesion, strength, and ability in dominating RMC for a 31-15 victory.

Five minutes of constant pressure by the Toronto forwards, led by Mike Code, culminated in captain John Drummond's dive across the line for the first try, converted by Bruce Carroll. RMC's attacks were easily repulsed by the visitors' defence, until the forwards returned to the scoreboards with a try by Neil Sorbie, and a conversion and penalty kick from Carroll.

The second half started with the same pressure, resulting in Randy Filinski's dive in for a try, converted by Carroll. Filinski scored again when a cross-kick from the wing redeemed a seemingly ineffective back movement by wrong-footing the defence.

Blues seemed to tire here and RMC struck back for two quick tries, both converted and a penalty kick. Then the Toronto squad reasserted its superiority, with Paul Kitchen leaving a trail of dejected defenders in his wake for a try in the corner, Bruce Carroll's conversion kick, taken on the stroke of time, bounced in off the post to complete the scoring.

The Blues first XV displays fine conditioning and aggressive play this season. This is the result not only of considerable new talent arriving, but also a more vigorous training program. They look to be very strong contenders for the OUA title.

The second XV shut out RMC 13-0.

The game for the most part was dominated by the Blues pack, which confidently handled itself in the scrums and in the rucks and line-outs as well.

The Toronto team went on the attack immediately as they kicked off to the Redmen and followed up to within 15 yards of hosts' goal-line.

Here Rick Hodder made good on a penalty kick for three points.

Determined not to become complacent, Toronto moved quickly up the field from the kick-off and soon were threatening again.

Again a penalty kick was awarded to the Blues, but Hodder was unable to connect and the Redmen cleared the ball from their end by a 25 drop-out. However, Toronto continued to play hard and RMC were unable to sustain any real threat.

At the 20 minute mark fly-half Purdy of the Blues broke through, from a scrum 20 yards out, to the one yard line of RMC where a loose ruck was set up. The Blues pack, in one of the best plays of the afternoon, drove in hard and won the ball. Scrum-half Gary Mossman showed no hesitation as he gathered up the ball and dove between the posts for 4 points. Hodder converted to put Toronto ahead 9-0.

In the second half play began to get rather ragged especially in the backs of both teams. Early in the half, the Blues backs put it together as they drove down the left wing and winger Bill Procuiner went in for an unconverted try at the corner.

That seemed to be the game as the Blues backs could not do anything with the ball afterwards. While the pack continued to dominate and to win the ball, a series of dropped passes denied the team of any more points.

The Blues pack as a unit definitely played a fine game and if this trend continues they should have few problems during the rest of the season. Next Wednesday both teams travel to York while on the Saturday they host RMC.

TA union drive wins recruits

Graduate Assistants at U of T may soon have the right to bargain collectively if an organizing drive by the newly formed Graduate Assistants Association GAA continues to recruit more members.

According to full time organizer Andy Stanely the association now has over half of the required 700 members to apply to the Ontario Labor Relations Board for a certification vote. There are approximately 2,000 graduate assistants at U of T. Thirty-five per cent must join before the GAA can apply for certification.

The organization held its first meeting last week and elected Michael O'Keefe as president. The remainder of the executive includes John Johnson, Janis Sulpis and Stelios Missirliis. There are five other representatives from the various divisions in the School of Graduate Studies.

Last June a similar organization disbanded after gaining 300 members because of mistakes made in trying to meet with Ontario Labor Relations Board requirements.

The Graduate Students Union hired Stanley in April to help organize the association. This year they have already gained more than half their target membership in the ten days of registration.

They are planning to go into the departments this week.

The main reason for attempts to gain collective bargaining, according to Stanley, is that graduate assistants do 40 per cent of undergraduate teaching, yet have average wages of under $1,000 a year. Graduate assistants include teaching assistants, markers, tutors, research assistants, demonstrators, and instructors.

O'Keefe explained that the GAA "is trying to get away from just financial grievances" and is also concerned with job security, hiring procedures and gaining a voice for graduate assistants on committees and governing bodies.

At present Windsor is the only university with certified graduate assistants association in Canada. The Windsor association has gained a uniform wage of $2400, the maximum allowed by law, a grievance procedure, and a voice in departmental hiring committees.

According to Stanley one of the main problems at U of T is the vast amount of variation in work loads and wages paid in different departments. According to a 1972 GSU study arts assistants are much better paid though proportionally less are hired.

One of the largest proportions of the present membership of the association is in engineering where wages are the lowest. In physical and life sciences average incomes for full time students are as low as $800 and $900 compared to $1800 for humanities and $1250 for social sciences. In some departments assistants are expected to take on teaching and marking without pay.

One of the aims of the association is standardized wages based on accurate estimates of time required to fulfill teaching and related duties. Now in many cases payment is "purely on the basis of contact hours and doesn't take into account the amount of preparation and marking time" according to Stanley.

However despite these conditions the GAA has had some problems in organizing. Some people are afraid of strikes and others are reluctant to join what has been regarded as an activist organization, Stanley said.

However the GAA points out in a pamphlet that under the association's constitution two thirds of the membership must vote for a strike on a secret ballot.

Stanley explained that "conventional wisdom has been against joining. We are breaking into a monolith of opinion against organizing."

Both Stanley and O'Keefe felt that although there has not been too much organized resistance the association's campaign, that this will increase when the certification vote number is reached.

The GAA is now fighting the university over the university's refusal to give the assistants vacation pay, which is mandatory under the Ontario Employment Standards Act. They have appealed for a ruling the Ministry of Labor and the U of T administration is getting its solicitors, Cassels Brock, to find a loophole to get out of paying the retroactive pay of over a quarter of a million dollars as far back as 1966.

U of T buried in committees

By PAUL McGRATH

Does the university need any additions to the long list of committees and sub-committees presently in existence? The recently-released report of the Committee to Implement the Berlyne Report seems to think so.

Two of the committees recommendations, hammered out during 15 sessions this summer, called for the institution of a new Curriculum Committee and a Committee on Instruction and Evaluation, both within the faculty of Arts and Sciences.

The implementation committee, chaired by psychology professor J.E. Foley, was set up this spring to look after the confusing work of putting the recommendations of the Berlyne report into effect. And what might the Berlyne report be? We hear you ask.

When the New Program was instituted in the academic year 1969-1970 to loosen what had been previously strict academic requirements, it was done with the proviso that its progress would be reviewed in a few year's time. In 1972, this was done under Prof. D.E. Berlyne, and his committee's report made quite a few recommendations about academic programs and teaching quality. In order to integrate these recommendations into the present administrative system, the implementation committee was set up.

The first recommendations Foley's committee dealt with were on the topic of academic programs. The Berlyne committee suggested four distinct types of programs, a single-major, a combined-major, a theme program and a liberal-arts program.

To deal with the more varied directions of study in which these recommendations would result, the implementation committee suggested a restructuring of the curriculum committees presently within the Faculty.

A present there are five of these committees, one each for Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical Science, Life Science and Interdisciplinary Studies. The implementation committee suggested that all these become sub-committees of a larger Faculty Curriculum Committee, consisting of up to 10 people, chosen by the members of the existing committees, which include 30 faculty, 15 full-time students and five part-time students.

The possible new programs will be available to students in the next few years and the report stresses that they are not mandatory, although it does suggest that students taking any of them indicate so on their pre-registration forms.

The Faculty Curriculum Committee would look after the approval of new courses, periodic review of the existing courses and the election of a student counsellor for each of the programs. The report also stressed the need of the Curriculum Committee "to initiate a review of the numbering of courses with the objective of ensuring that the 100-400 series denote an increase in the intensity and depth of the work."

Of the possible ten members of the committee, the report states that at least three should be students and at least another three be faculty, with the Dean of the Faculty or his designate acting as chairman.

The report is unclear as to which level of committee should be responsible for the job of student counselling, one of the major concerns of the Berlyne report. The report states that a counsellor should be available for every program, but that confusion is most likely in theme and liberal arts programs, where more than one department is responsible for the student's program. The report suggested that the chairman of each sub-committee of the Curriculum Committee might best fit the bill and stated:

"Indeed, to appoint Faculty Program Directors in competition with these sub-committee chairman seems to us to create a confusion of roles and to reduce the likelihood that rational and coordinated planning will occur."

To meet this confusion, the committee suggested that each college choose a College Program director and that they meet regularly with the sub-committee chairman.

The second committee the report recommended is a Committee on Instruction and Evaluation to deal with recommendations on quality of teaching and effective ways of ensuring that quality was kept up. The committee would consist of a faculty member from each of the division of Humanities, Social, Physical Science and Life Science as well as one faculty member from the Erindale campus.

This committee is supposed to overlook methods of evaluation, which include the institution of course evaluations carried out by the committee, to make available assistance to faculty members who want to improve their teaching and to make policies regarding grading courses and the size of classes.

Two of the topics that caused the committee the most trouble were the amount of courses a student might be able to take and his or her rate of progress. The report stated the problem this way:

"When the New Program was introduced the Faculty took a very large step in increasing the flexibility of students in two respects namely, in the organization of their programs and in allowing the retention of credit for courses passed within an otherwise failed year. This latter, in combination with the regulations relating to course load, meant that the New Program was operating on neither a 'year' nor a 'credit' system, but somewhere in between."

To increase flexibility, the committee decided that a four-course load for a student was acceptable which would further break down the difference between part-time and full-time students.

On this topic of part-time study, the committee admitted that it was facing the "most vital concern" of the Faculty, a policy of admission to the proposed "College X", the college for part-time students. The committee noted the possibility of a student entering part-time study with an average less than that required for admission into full-time study who might then take a summer course in "College X" as an "easy route" to full-time study. The possibility of students choosing this route rather than accepting full-time study at Scarborough and Erindale would create "an essentially uncontrolled enrollment rate" on the St. George campus.

Women's lectures begin

By BETH STEWART

"If one believed Canadian texts, one would believe that women did not exist outside the home," Ceta Ramkhalawansingh told an audience at the introductory lecture last Wednesday of "Women, Oppression and Liberation", a U of T interdisciplinary course.

She stressed the fact that little attention has been paid to women's role in history and the arts.

"Women have an incredible un-written history," Ramkhalawansingh said. "Our task is to write it."

She outlined women's position in society with a series of illuminating statistics. For instance, men are paid 59 per cent to 166 per cent higher wages than women for the same work.

She went on to say that the social structure which has held women down for so long is rooted in economics. Such implications of this premise as the family being no more than an accounting unit will be explored in subsequent course lectures.

Some criticism was evoked by the separation of men and women in the discussion groups which followed the lecture. One man remarked that "the segregation was sexist. I was surprised." Some women were annoyed at the segregation and thought it unnecessary.

However, the course organizers explained that it had been their past experience that the presence of men in discussion groups tended to inhibit women. Although the men were at first displeased at the segregation, they soon found that they were able to carry on discussion among themselves.

With the advent of the women's liberation movement, a demand for university courses about women has grown. U of T's answer to the demand, "Women, Oppression and Liberation," was organized three years ago by a group of 15 professional and university women.

The Wednesday night lectures, part of the full credit course, are open to the general public, and free of charge in the hope that members of the community will bring their experiences to enrich the course.

The course planners say they wish to avoid academic narrowness.

Listen to the rhythm of the wrecking balls

Eaton's and Fairview Corp. applied for demolition permits last Wednesday and Thursday for many of the buildings now occupying the site of the proposed Eaton's Fairview complex bounded by Dundas, Queen, Bay and Yonge Streets.

Although the City's Buildings and Development Committee passed a resolution last Monday that would allow the city to routinely hold up issuing demolition permits for two weeks, the resolution was not passed by Toronto City Council, because provincial legislation would be required to give the city power to hold up demolitions.

The city can only hold back for 60 days on a demolition permit if the building in question has been approved by council as an historically or architecturally important site.

There are several structures in the block where the Eaton-Fairview development will be built that have been added to the City's list of historic buildings—Holy Trinity Church, the old City Hall, Trinity Rectory and Scadding House on Trinity Lane, but these buildings are not slated for demolition, and two of the Rectory and Scadding House are to be moved to new locations facing a park to be constructed on Louisa Street south of Holy Trinity Church.

Two buildings recently recommended by the Toronto Historical Board for inclusion on the city's list have not yet been approved by council. These Buildings—a Victorian commercial block at the southwest corner of Yonge and Teraulay Street, and the Eaton warehouse at the southeast corner of James and Louisa Street—will fall to the wrecker's hammer if the permits are granted.

The Toronto Historical Board also voted to include the U of T owned building, 188 Yonge Street, on its list of historical and architectural gems. The U of T has been attempting to negotiate the sale of the building to Fairview this summer and will be considering the problem in Governing Council committees this week.

Groups opposing the Eaton centre development will be appearing at a Committee of Adjustment meeting Tuesday night at City Hall, where Fairview is applying for transfer of air rights from one part of the proposed development, and for severance rights, that would allow redivision of land into different parcels for development purposes.

David Lewis Stein, a member of the Annex Ratepayers' Association, contends that the "Eaton Centre has always been considered in isolation" from the rest of the redevelopment of Yonge Street, but in fact will be the catalyst for change which might

The Variety—Michael Cowler

Eaton's applied for a demolition order against this building last week. It is the home of Theatre Passe Muraille, but not for long. Ah yes, the lovely sound of jackhammers.

well destroy what is the "last habitable main street in North America."

Although there was some consideration by the city planning staff of certain aspects of the development like the closure of the streets in the downtown area and the original appearance of the Fairview mall (that would have, if it had gone unchanged, presented a solid cement face to Yonge Street), Stein commented that there has been no study or discussion of the preservation of Yonge Street as a whole has taken place.

Once Eaton Centre is built, there will be a domino effect as far as development goes, Stein says. Most of the land between Dundas and Gerrard has been assembled, and Eaton's College Street will be redeveloped.

The bazaar like quality of Yonge Street, the collections of small stores and craft shops, will probably disappear, in favour of the larger stores that can afford the high rent and high risks of a shopping mall like Fairview has planned.

The province, which owns the land between Grosvenor and Wellesley, except for the properties fronting directly on Yonge, will also be producing a massive development in that area, although the original plans were scuttled by opposition from local resident organizations.

The English clothing store Marks and Spencer plans a large store on the east side opposite the planned Fairview mall. It will probably be the prelude to redevelopment of the east side of the street.

Opponents of the Eaton-Fairview scheme are concerned, not only about preserving certain buildings and land marks, but about preserving the whole mixed and vital character of Yonge Street, as it has been for years.

Take a last look

If you want to take a look at downtown Toronto before wreckers move in, and before Toronto gets its own downtown shopping mall, you should take a trip to the Yonge and Queen area pretty soon. Last week, the developers for 'Eaton Centre, Fairview Corp., applied for demolition permits on the following buildings in the area bounded by Dundas, Queen, Yonge and Bay streets:

- 220 to 300 Yonge Street
- 10 to 14 Albert Street
- 10 to 24 Louisa Street
- 9 and 11 Trinity Square
- 25, 89 and 91 Dundas Street
- 10, and 12 Teraulay Street

Line up for lettuce

By CHRIS PROBERT

You can now eat California lettuce.

On Friday, the Teamsters' Union and the AFL-CIO, acting for the United Farmworkers of America, agreed to end the lettuce boycott by the UFW, at least until 1975. In return the Teamsters have agreed to stay out of the grape fields. The UFW will now concentrate on their grape boycott.

The lettuce boycott has been in force for the last five years, and came about because the Teamsters have been signing contracts with growers to harvest the lettuce. The UFW regards the Teamsters' involvement as likely to undo the advances which it has gained for migrant farm workers, largely Chicano, and play into the hands of the growers.

Current contracts held by the Teamsters on lettuce do not expire until 1975. At that time, the UFW will have the option to enter into negotiation for contracts and/or reactivate the boycott, if necessary.

In August, it was reported that 30 grape growers in the Delano Valley, California, controlling 40 per cent of the crop, had signed with the Teamsters. However, Marshal Ganz, a leader of the UFW currently in Toronto to publicize its aims, was quoted as saying that the growers will not pursue legal action now that the Teamsters have agreed to stay out of grape harvesting, because the contracts were not actually signed.

According to Richard Paredes, a spokesman for the UFW, it is felt that the grape boycott will now become much more effective, since the UFW no longer has to worry about the lettuce boycott and also because the growers no longer have the Teamsters to fall back on as an alternative to UFW demands. The UFW is hoping that the growers will thus be forced to negotiate new contracts with the grape pickers.

New College votes tomorrow

The last five positions on the New College Student Council will be filled in today's and tomorrow's freshman and SAC representative election.

There has been an increase in freshman interest in the council, according to NCSC president John Ross, as evidenced in the rather large number of candidates running for positions.

Candidates for Social Commission are Mary Lynne (Mae) Rochon and Sue Hersberg. For women's athletics, contenders are Lynn Sproule, Shelley Morehouse and Marsha Magidson. Men's athletics has three freshmen candidates, Kerr Banduk, Don Hunter and Gary Resnick. The position of education commissioner was filled by an acclaimed candidate, Jason Hanson.

The SAC representative's seat is being contested by two candidates, Ida Deutsch and Laurence Coleman. In the past the NCSC has been criticized for not providing enough services for the day and professional faculty students. According to Ross, however, the executive of the council has recently begun a policy of preference for New College students. Members of the college and their friends will be allowed early admission to the pubs and all dances. The council is also publicizing the fact that all New College students can use the college's recreational services and the music room.

The NCSC has also been negotiating with the college administration for adequate lunch facilities in the cafeterias and snack bar. The council was particularly concerned, Ross said, that students be drawn to the college to learn about college activities and events.

The most important issue for New College students this term, Ross said, is the library issue. The Governing Council's library subcommittee agreed to delay the planned amalgamation of the New College library and the Signud Samuel Library, until the college submits a report defining the kind of library to be retained at the college. The New College Council, which still has seats open for students representation, has been considering whether the library should have a circulating collection, and whether the library should contain basic texts for first and second year students.

Queen's remains in KINGSTON (CUP) — Expressing feelings of optimism and tolerance for the fledgling Ontario Federation Of Students (OFS), Queen's University decided last week to remain a member of the organization.

The majority of the student government at the university decided that the OFS should not be judged solely on its past efforts but on what it would be offering in the future. The supporters pointed out that there had been growing pains and that, after last summer's reorganization, there is much the OFS is offering.

The chief opponent of OFS membership had been External Affairs Commissioner Kiloran German, but she seemed to arouse little support for the move to withdraw, which had previously created considerable discussion from many at Queen's.

Germans' main criticism was that, in the past, OFS had offered little or nothing which could "not have been handled in the absence of a formal organization". She felt that OFS is an ineffective, self-centered body. "The student delegates are not truly representative of their home campuses," she said.

Both sides agreed, in the end, that the OFS could be offering more. Various members of the Student Council volunteered their services.

Present at the meeting and supporting the OFS were four members of the OFS executive, two of whom are from Queen's.

"The university draws in and produces critical thought in such a way as to institutionalize it. This imprisons critical thought and thinkers and allows them to develop unrealistically."
- Draft Introduction to the SAC COPSEO brief

The Varsity a member of Canadian University Press was founded in 1960 and is published by the Students Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Danson Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors 91 St. George St.

Parallel structures should be referendum issue

The Students' Administrative Council intends to hold a referendum a couple of weeks from now dealing with the National Union of Students (that is whether or not U of T undergrads want to join it), the question of a majority student representation on the men's athletic directorate, and whether students want parity on hiring, firing, and staffing committees. Today we'll comment on the so called "tenure" issue and the form of representation that we felt students ought to be voting for.

(More on the athletic directorate and NUS later on in the month.)

We've commented so far this year on the Forster Report with its glaring lack of recommendations for structures for student involvement in the hiring, firing, and promotion aspects of faculty members. And Friday we briefly tried to provide some background and history on the question of parity. Today we would like to go into the whole political question of parity, what form of equality we would like to see, and why.

Those who read the two editorials mentioned above on the question of student involvement in the academic affairs of the university might realize by now that while we agree with the principle of parity there's a point at which the whole parity question and student involvement becomes next to useless. That happens, we feel, if you have the student members elected to, say, for example, the Governing Council, and they then act in their own self interest rather than that of the students. What we're really talking about is the co-optation by the administration to enlist students to serve on the Governing Council. As today's editorial cartoon might emphasize — through the administrative and student governing symbols of first Bob Anderson and then Jill Conway — students are susceptible to co-optation if they sit on a body along with other reps such as administrative and teaching faculty members.

And the pressure is in fact quite strong. Take the example of Rhodes scholar Paul Cadario, now diligently studying in England. Only last year the students' elected representative Cadario, participated in one of the greatest sell-outs by students at this university — he successfully worked on and steered the discipline code through the Internal Affairs Committee. And other reps such as Aron Goldberg haven't exactly been the most progressive people to hit the council (Goldberg is the only student to return for yet a second year, although he wasn't noted for his dynamic presence at council meetings last year, in fact he didn't even attend very many).

Perhaps the situation would be different with the students' elected representatives if they were compelled to show more concern for their fellow students, and had to be in some way responsible to students for decisions they made at closer intervals than only once a year at election time.

A second reason for wanting to see students' elected representatives subject to the student body is to counter the elitism which has prevailed in the past. Again student representation on the Governing Council serves as a good example — not in the case of every representative mind you, but the aforementioned examples illustrate what we mean. To have members who can't be controlled through, for example, accreditation by the elected student representative is to leave them detached from the people whose interest they were elected to serve.

And this only brings to us to the topic of this month's coming referendum on hiring, firing, and promotion policies as they apply to faculty. The Students' Administrative Council is pushing for — as of its last general SAC meeting anyway — student/non-student parity on any committees examining the question of tenure, hiring, firing, etc.

As Gary Webster pointed out in a quote in Friday's editorial, perhaps the proper way to handle this sort of question is through the establishment of parallel committees, representing students, administration, and faculty, each in their turn. This would hopefully create a better climate of representation within each group, and, each group would exercise veto power over the decision of the other one or two.

We feel that the SAC should be asking this question in the referendum — a parallel structure parity situation rather than the combined committee parity model. We've seen examples to refute the latter (once again the Governing Council, although here the students are overwhelmingly in the minority), so perhaps on a departmental body such as staffing committees we should try to push for the parallel structures idea supported by several student leaders of the past, including those who were involved with the parity struggle from the beginning and appear to have some fairly intelligent comments to make on the theory. Why not try the practise?

Most of Merry Widow's glitter is in audience

With Rollie Michener and his party in the audience Saturday night at O'Keefe, the Canadian Opera Company's performance of The Merry Widow should have been a glittering affair. However, the audience had most of the glitter.

The Merry Widow, so the publicity tells us, is frothy and fun, an inconsequential piece of Viennese light opera. This is quite accurate—it demands an irreverent approach that is unlike anything else in "grand" opera, precisely because it isn't grand. It's fun, or is supposed to be.

Just about the only ones who were fully aware of this were the chorus, who, happily, appear in scene after scene, waltzing, wining and leering at the principals. Lloyd Bradshaw's hand is quite evident here, because they sang with confidence and skill, but never forgot that they were portraying Viennese socialites of the turn of the century.

The stars were entirely another matter. Just about the only one who realized the comic implications of the well-worn script was Jan Rubes as the Baron, who is being cuckolded in blissful ignorance. Allen Coates, as Njegus, the embassy clerk, also gave a creditable performance. These two singers seem to have realized that the Widow can be hammed up and still come off. As I said, a little more hamming all around would only have livened up the proceedings.

As for the widow herself, she really didn't seem too merry. Her main fault was an apparent inability to project over the orchestra. Sitting in the eighth row, she was inaudible at times. At the back of that cavernous barn this must have been the case throughout the evening. When the action subsided, and she could give her all in the big solo numbers, she displayed a voice that was quite fine. When the action resumed, though, she appeared to forget all about projection.

John Reardon, as the male lead Count Danilo, was fortunate to look the part. Slim and regal-looking, he carried the performance, getting the largest hand from the audience at the end. This seems to be a role he has done for years, possibly making a career out of it. When this production played the O'Keefe back in 1970, he appeared in the same role, and his approach hasn't changed in the least. He too has realized the work's limitations and has made the most of them.

As for the rest of the principals, well... someone should tell them that The Merry Widow needs some sparkle, some zip. Only in one scene did the show really come to life, during the "Women" number. This is usually a show-stopper, with all the male principals lamenting about the way to deal with women, and then doing everything from running into the audience to a can-can line while singing. If the rest of the evening could have had as much pep as this scene, the opera would be a winner all around.

The Canadian Opera Company knows which side it's bread is buttered on, though. The Widow is slated for eight performances this season, and Saturday's was standing room only. Evidently, people like opera enough to flock to a performance like the COC gave last Saturday, and if this helps defray the debts incurred by speculative projects like Gotterdammerung, then there's no reason to complain. But if you're looking for a first-rate performance with lots of drive and fast pacing, then there's sure room for criticism.

Union lawyer OK say local officers

At the hearing scheduled before a board of arbitration Thursday morning, Greg Keilty and Claude Brown attempted to dismiss Martin Levinson, Sack and Dunn as their lawyers and indicated they did not wish to be represented by any lawyer.

This action is the latest in a long line of incidents designed to embarrass the Service Employees Union, Local 204.

You will recall that both Keilty and Brown were discharged in February of 1973. The union went through the steps of the grievance procedure and could not get the university to reverse their decision. They notified the university that they wished to proceed to arbitration as far back as the latter part of February 1973.

The union then appointed Drummond Wren as its nominee to the arbitration board. Immediately, an objection was raised by Mr. Keilty to the appointment of Drummond Wren in this position. You should know that Mr. Wren is the most experienced union nominee in the province and has acted for virtually every union, both national and international, for over 25 years. Mr. Wren has acted as nominee for many grievors who are members of our union and the union refused to appoint a different nominee.

The next step involved a request by Keilty and Brown that they be permitted to choose their own legal counsel. The executive board of Local 204 denied this request because they felt that Keilty and Brown were entitled to the same legal services as other members of the union.

The next step in this story was when Keilty and Brown requested that the executive board permit them to present their own case at arbitration. After a number of discussions with the executive board, a letter was sent to Keilty and Brown on May 15, 1973. In this letter, Mr. Hearn, for the executive board of Local 204, stated that Keilty and Brown would be entitled to the same legal services as any other member of the union from the firm which the union has utilized for over a decade, namely Levinson, Sack and Dunn.

Mr. Keilty and Mr. Brown then discussed the matter with one of the partners at Levinson, Sack and Dunn on a number of occasions. First of all, they requested an adjournment of the hearing originally set for Monday, July 25, 1973 on the grounds that certain members of Mr. Brown's family were ill. The union agreed to the adjournment, even though it was required to pay a cancellation fee to the chairman. Subsequently, a hearing was set for September 25, 1973 and both Keilty and Brown attended at the offices of Levinson, Sack and Dunn to prepare this case, thereby accepting the firm as being their legal counsel at the arbitration hearing. At the hearing Thursday, Keilty and Brown again asked the arbitration board to permit them to present their own case. They alleged that the services given to them by Levinson, Sack and Dunn were unsatisfactory. We are instructed by Levinson, Sack and Dunn that they have considered this matter over a long period of time and were prepared to meet the case against Keilty and Brown in an adequate manner. It seems clear that Keilty and Brown do not wish to proceed with the case, except on the terms which they themselves desire.

You will know that the union has a clear obligation under the collective agreement to pay for one-half of the costs of the chairman and the fees of the union nominee. If Keilty and Brown handled the conduct of this case and forced the hearing into some 20 or 25 days, by calling all kinds of irrelevant witnesses, the cost to your union could run into thousands of dollars more than if the case was handled in an appropriate manner. Not only would we be required to pay for the chairman's fees as well as the union nominee's fees, but also lost time for union witnesses, etc.

All members of our union have been given adequate service by Levinson, Sack and Dunn over the years. Any bad precedents which might be set by Keilty and Brown through the improper carriage of their case could affect other union members represented by us. For this and other reasons, we took the position that Keilty and Brown should get the same representation as anybody else and they in fact accepted this after the May 15, 1973 letter to them.

We can only conclude that they have acted in bad faith today and are attempting to have their cases dealt with in the manner in which the executive board denied them last May. Service Employees Union, Local 204

This more-on says Varsity half-assed

I am a first year student who would like to congratulate The Varsity on its continuous efforts to keep any relevant university material out of the paper, while at the same time extolling the non-existent virtues of 10th-rate politicians like Salvador Allende (you'll recall him, he's the fellow you're trying to make a martyr of). The Varsity's inane preoccupation with the Chile situation seems to merit endless front page space, while with a minimal amount of research your staff would have discovered that in three short years, the Allende regime managed to destroy the Chilean nation both economically and politically. You may also be interested to know that Canada's ambassador to Chile, who is a good deal closer to the situation than The Varsity staff has asserted that if the coup had not taken place, Chile would have been ravaged by a full-scale civil war.

The Varsity's second favourite subject to beat to death would seem to be the condition of migrant grape-pickers in California. That fetid show shows your total ignorance of the plight of French-Canadian labourers right here in Canada (you'll recall Canada, it's the country you live in).

So, Varsity, it's time you cut the socialist propaganda. If you're using my money to roll off the presses, I want a university newspaper, not a half-assed imitation of the Sun. Finally, if you care to print a rebuttal, might I suggest a new title for your letter column... more on.

Nature of Zionism revealed by letter

I found the letter written by Mr. Rubenstein in Wednesday's Varsity, and the subsequent lecture by Dr. Mevinski, to be very revealing of the character of Zionism and its supporters.

I would like Mr. Rubenstein to supply proof for his malicious allegations that the Arab Student Federation deliberately set the lecture of Dr. Mevinski for the beginning of Rosh Hashana. Secondly, if it was such a great crime for the lecture to have taken place, why then did Dr. Mevinski in fact show up at all? For he is of somewhat conservative background. Indeed as the lecturer said, the High Holidays are supposed to involve the idea of repentance and charity, thus presenting a perfect excuse, if ever one where needed, for attending his lecture.

It also amazed me to read that Mr. Rubenstein professes to be ashamed that Dr. Mevinski was born a Jew! What this reveals, is the anti-democratic, not to mention the anti-Jewish nature of Zionism itself.

Lastly, I would question Mr. Rubenstein's charge—the usual one made by Zionists everywhere—that their critics—the anti-Zionists—are by definition anti-semitic. The charges in the letter are all the more absurd, for Dr. Mevinski is certainly a semite, as are each and every Arab belonging to the Arab Federation...

In any case, although it was regrettable that little dialogue was achieved, due to the absence of Zionists (except for one or two) I must indeed thank the Zionists for not coming. Last year's lecture by Michel Chartrand was the unfortunate stage for an animal show that did nothing to help the Zionists cause anywhere anytime

Arabs defend timing of lecture

This refers to a lecture by R.E. Rubinstein (SGS) on Wednesday, September 26, denouncing our timing for a lecture on Zionism by Professor Norton Mevinski ("The Dezonization of Israel") to occur with the advent of a Jewish holiday.

It is unfortunate that Mr. Rubinstein did not wait until the lecture was actually held before making his slanderous remarks about our "master stroke of strategic timing," our "cowardice", and our intention not to allow many Jews to attend and argue with us. He, moreover, distorted Professor Mevinski's position before the man had the chance to speak (see Varsity, Friday September 28).

Actually, there were many Jews who did attend the lecture and they expressed their opinions loudly and clearly, some in support of Professor Mevinski. But evidently, Rubinstein is so blinded by his prejudices and the myths inculcated in his head by the Zionist myth-making machinery that he jumps to his conclusion merely to detect.

Professor Mevinski, it should be pointed out, has been speaking and writing on this subject for many years, and this in New York City, not always on holidays. He is a Jew who applies his judgement according to principles of justice and equality to the whole world including Israel. He himself, and not we, chose this date of the advent of Rosh Hashonah as the best time for the Jews to remember the injustice which the Zionists have inflicted on the Palestinians and to atone for them, just as they expect the Western world to atone for its sins.

Is Québec's Union Nationale fighting its last election?

By PIERRE GODIN
and ROBERT LEVESQUE
Adapted from QUEBEC-PRESSE

With an election scheduled for October 29th in Québec, Quebec-Presse, a Montreal weekly, begins a series examining the images of the different political parties. Today we feature the Union Nationale, the party whose position has changed for the worse in Québec since the last election in 1970. Attempts have been made to rejuvenate the party and the UN's leader, Gabriel Loubier, has brought into the party a team of four young strategists from Québec universities. One year after their beginning with the party — which has reached its lowest point ever in terms of electoral support — Quebec Presse talked with the four about their strategy for the party. Godin and Levesque also analysed Mr. Loubier's new electoral program — "Pour l'avenir du Québec" (For the future of Québec).

Gabriel Loubier's "brain trust" has tried unsuccessfully for over a year to amalgamate the Union Nationale and the Parti Québécois. Faced with the sad state of the Union Nationale UN, and realizing that only a merger with another party could save the UN, the four strategists-first brought into the party by Loubier — also looked to the Ralliement des Crédiistes. But the election of Yvon Dupuis as leader of the Crédiistes eliminated any hopes of a merger.

Furthermore, the union of Dupuis' party with the UN would automatically mean the withdrawal of the four political strategists brought in by the UN leader. Marcel Côté, one of the four and director of the program, frankly conceded that "If Dupuis joins the UN, I'll leave the party."

Brought into the Union Nationale to rejuvenate the party, these four university-trained men — Michel Bellavance, Jean-Pierre Nadeau, Marcel Côté, and Jacques Desbiens — admitted to us that if they left the UN they "would seriously consider joining the PQ".

Background to negotiations

Since their arrival, Loubier's four young men, as they became known, had persuaded him that amalgamation with another party was the only route to survival for the UN. Only through a merger could the downward trend of the party's popularity be reversed. But the Parti Québécois understood without a doubt that the most popular members in the Union Nationale had already either left the UN under Loubier's leadership, or else joined the PQ. The PQ didn't think it had a great deal to gain by accepting the UN's offer of a merger. Granted the UN did have an organizational machine and an electoral chest of $5 million, but it was not worth the loss of support that would be brought about by any links with a "losing" party.

As for the Crédiistes, the UN should have found a more responsive membership. The UN figured that since it was, in fact, "an army without soldiers", it would have to appeal to a party with a somewhat similar following to ensure itself of a large number of votes. But Yvon Dupuis was, in the opinion of Loubier's four strategists, a "nuisance", and they wouldn't see an alliance with the Crédiistes, because of, as they put it, "the leader".

As one of them put it: "The Crédiistes, in our opinion, speak the language of the people more than the PQ. They identify the real problems, but are incapable of bringing about solutions to these problems. With the UN, in power this would be possible."

Confronted with this situation — the impossibility of selling the party to the PQ or of gathering the Crédiiste supporters back into "the fold" — the Union Nationale is far from being ready for a fall election. At least that's what comes across quite clearly from the comments of the UN's four political strategists.

"We don't have a definite strategy worked out", one of them concludes. Another points out that not one candidate has yet been chosen in the 110 provincial ridings. Also, the polls — all of them — only grant the UN five or six per cent of the vote. The party's program for the next five years, were it to be elected, is not very well known to the electorate due to a lack of advanced canvassing. Finally, Loubier doesn't yet have a "salable electoral image".

An attempt to revive the UN's standing in the National Assembly

The Loubier team feels it must bring about a "rebirth" of the elected members of the National Assembly. They realize that to accomplish a strengthening of the elected representatives in the Assembly they must find people who are in tune with the mood of their ridings and who have worked there for some time. Unfortunately time is needed to carry out that part of the program.

The ideas of the "brain trust" are only dreams at the moment, since the organizational wing is completely outside the bounds of their jurisdiction. At the moment the organizational aspects of the party are entrusted to a committee including the MNA's and Normand Cherry, a trade union representative.

The serious organizational work of the coming election will be assumed by the "old guard", and their strategy will probably reflect the outdated ideas of "the grand old party" — the Union Nationale, that is. Loubier's four strategists will be little more than onlookers. Since the new people haven't yet found common ground with the older members who control the party machine, there's little hope of seeing a rejuvenated Union Nationale presenting a new image to the electorate in the coming month.

The UN will present itself as "an alternative to the present power"

For the moment the Union Nationale is planning the approach to the election without thinking of immediately joining with another party. "We will not act like a third party", Jean-Pierre Nadeau claims, "but instead we will present the UN as a great party, as the alternative to the power of the Liberals. Our number one target remains the Liberal party. As for the PQ, we will attack it on its platform planks of socialism and nationalism, and on the fact that independence would severely upset the general population."

The four new recruits, who at first wooed René Lévesque's party with the intention of regaining the Québec nationalists that they had lost, intends to present the UN with a more down to earth appearance than that of the PQ. According to them, a maximum of 15 per cent of the population desires independence, and almost a third of the Québécois are satisfied with the status quo on the constitutional subject.

"The majority wishes something between the two (the Liberals and the PQ)", they conclude. They decided that the Union Nationale must carve out a thin road between these two parties, since it's impossible to join with any other Québec party running a government.

The UN was pushed out of political prominence by Crédiistes

The Union Nationale which now has few followers which has steadily lost ground to the Crédiistes over the (over the past 10 years relationship with the Crédiistes). And this meant "two-party" political system had remained static for years.

The general spirit of the "l'avenir du Québec" (F. Québec) has thrown all but once again giving the UN the once defined it on the Québec trum.

Since its founding the party to channel both the right wing vote — it's a conservative and a nation several years now the Parti rallied to its party the nation within Québec society. (A) under the leadership of Loubier, the "wicked socialist" even in Bourassa's cabinet are trying hard to give the party being a party of the right the extreme right.

So the UN finds itself in a traditional political role, and the fundamental objectives of its regain the lost ground by plan of nationalism and conservatism.

To rebuild its image as a Québecois' rights, Loubier is trying a cultural independence like that of the Liberal's sovereignty.

But the Union Nationale appears to be that the Liberal Québecois have attempted "nationalist ground" first. Some credibility in 1966 government, it got involved in a "language first" question. They assess is whether or not the give its confidence to the new Bill 63 through the legislature.

The UN is attempting to gain power of both the Liberals in the constitutional realm, by way between the servile federalism Bourassa and the Liberals, that they feel will respect the and the British North America decentralized federalism, to of the UN party.

The UN is proposing a formula which sees itself as a nature: that of 10 constitutive more sovereign in certain at present and whose activity ordained by a federal state would be defined in negotiations between only.

In sum, the UN is proposing between the 10 provinces date for the federal government a question of the political opposing Poles which seek to form the Liberal party also looking for a new arrangement.

More to the right than Dupuis

On the social and economic the UN's program appears to be Dupuis on the right. It has gone on record against socialism in favour of private enterprise which the Crédiiste leadership speaks on. If one looks at the program, the number of socialism in Québec will not Loubier.

In the educational system, it proposes a complete restructuring of everything that influences the private sector paralleling the health policy and to reform private diagnostic centres of specialists and chiropractors. Also, being in fact a very costly it must also attack the industry will not put the power of the large trade unions and strike but, as in past precedence will regulate strikes in a much more severe manner. It will also attempt to simultaneously exercise control on the budget of the central trade unions.

The UN and the Ralliement Créditiste — the same electorate, the same conservative line, the same slogans.

The UN and the RC don't only have the same body of the electorate to appeal to, a social base almost identical to each other, and a conservative program; they also have the same political slogans.

In the upcoming election Loubier is going to attack the right and the left saying "Wait a minute, that doesn't make sense!" while Dupuis is going to campaign on the words "We must stop that, vote Créditiste!" In other words, they are both not saying much.

The slogans attempt to appeal to the most reactionary elements of the population. It's a long way from the slogans of the 1960's: "Maitre chez nous" (1962), and "Egalité ou indépendance" (1966).

The same electorate

The two political parties have their roots in the same electorate. A poll conducted by the la société Sorecom in 1972 showed that the principal beneficiary of the UN's decline was the Ralliement Créditiste.

Of the 47 per cent of the UN voters which admitted that they would no longer stick with that party, 26 per cent were going to vote for the Créditistes, 12 per cent for the PQ, and nine per cent for the Liberals. Moreover, in the 1962 federal elections, a sizable portion of Couette's Créditiste support came from provincial UN voters.

Everything points to the fact that the two parties have an identical social base — a fact which should favor a merger of the two. The UN and RC comprise two political groups with rural and semi-urban predominance. They're both attempting to channel the alienated segments of Quebec society: farmers, small merchants, low income workers.

In the 1970 elections a positive relation was discovered between the people who had voted in favour of the UN and the RC, and those who shared a conservative, anti-union ideology.

The UN: a party which has everything except voters

All the figures from polls or surveys give the same indication: that the UN almost doesn't exist as a party anymore. If the party still has money, an entrenched organization, personnel, and a leader, its electoral support has gone elsewhere.

The decline of the UN began 15 years ago; it's not a recent phenomenon even if the polls of the last two years make it seem that way. The party doesn't have the support of more than five or six per cent of the voters.

At the most, less than 10 per cent.

Since 1956 each general election has been an opportunity for the UN to lose votes. The following decline in the percentage of vote received serves as an indication:

1956	51.6 per cent
1960	46.7 per cent
1962	42.1 per cent
1966	40.8 per cent
1970	19.6 per cent

Since 1970 different polls have been taken which show that the UN has lost even more ground. In 1972, a poll commissioned by la société Sorecom revealed that 47 per cent of those who had voted for the UN in 1970 would not be faithful at election time. The same poll indicated that the party would only be able to collect about eight per cent of the votes in the province.

Why does the UN remain as a party?

Faced with such a decline, the question that comes to mind is why does the UN refuse to dissolve itself as a political party? Why is it preparing for the upcoming election? The theories are numerous.

The first — and this the one receiving the most prominence within the UN's ranks — is that it's possible to regain power. Some party members use the 1966 election results as an example, when the UN successfully regained power from the Liberals. Many feel that if they did it once, they can do it again.

Perhaps, but the political atmosphere in 1973 isn't the same as that of 1966. That year the UN took power thanks to a favourable electoral map. And it's important to note that even though the party took power it continued to lose on the percentage of the total vote. Furthermore, in 1973 there's no longer the political vacuum that existed in 1966. Two other well-organized political parties — the PQ and the Créditistes — intend to replace the UN as the official opposition.

The second theory, which we have tried to point out in this article, is that Loubier is "killing time" until he can get a better opportunity for effecting an alliance with Dupuis' party. And neither the Liberals nor the PQ fails to realize the potential of a party uniting the UN money and organization and the Créditiste votes. That's one good reason why Bourassa's decided to call an election. The 1973 Québec election may be the last for the Union Nationale.

Hacks debate at 'Politics and Media' conference

News media blasted for 'pro-government bias'

By Tim Gallagher

Donald Macdonald, former provincial leader of the NDP, blasted the mass news media Saturday calling them "a propaganda agency for the government."

The charge was made during the opening panel of a weekend conference on Politics and the Media sponsored by the Ontario Woodworth Memorial foundation.

Macdonald (NDP-York South) charged there are definite "biases, prejudices, and discriminations in editorials," adding that the two largest parties, the Conservatives and Liberals, get all the publicity in the final analysis.

Macdonald got quick support from a former staffer of Canada's major wire service, Canadian Press. Korky Koroluk said the media shares the biases of big business "simply because the newspaper is big business."

He explained that the first pages of such papers as the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail are automatically sent by the CP wire service to all daily newspapers across the nation.

Other panelists on the first seminar entitled Editorial Imperative, had different ideas.

The provincial inexperience of most newspapers was admitted by Cameron Smith of the Globe but he didn't agree that provincial news coverage came (third on the totem pole) behind federal and local news.

The Fidinam and Hydro scandals were cited by Mr. Smith as examples of the Globe's criticism of big business. Closer to home, he hedged on references made to big advertisers, saying that the editors at the Globe "haven't supported Eaton's and Simpson's on some aspects of the proposed Eaton Centre."

The panel's token (radical), Arnold Amber, publisher and editor of the Toronto Citizen, jumped into the discussion by blaming the working journalists for biased coverage, citing that they are sometimes "the most easily seduced people in the world." Furthermore, he mentioned that publishers are often too occupied with other matters to "realize the problem."

Amber was convinced that the alternate press could escape advertising pressures and relate to major issues. The daily newspapers tend to focus on secondary issues like the height of the Eaton Centre. According to Amber they don't hit at the main issues — should the Eaton Centre even be built?

Executive editor of the Star Mark Harrison expressed his surprise at the "vast, inaccurate, generalizations," made by some of the panelists. He took their definitions of balanced newspaper reporting to mean not unbiased or unprejudiced, but biased and prejudiced in favour of the NDP. In his opinion, the media effects on public opinion are exaggerated.

The final panel of the day consisted of Desmond Morton, a U of T professor, Dalton Camp, a well-known conservative, and Alderman William Kilbourn. Their task was to assess the impact of the media on politics.

Kilbourn referred to council proceedings as the "political comic page" of the newspaper. But despite the antics covered by the press, he said, there are some very down-to-earth issues being discussed at meetings. The press in short is guilty of distortion. Papers like the Citizen, he felt, were good but are "just too poor" financially.

Morton, a NDP member, said that most politicians spend their time "plotting how to get into the news." He maintained that a journalist has more power than a backbencher.

Most of the press gallery in Ottawa and at Queen's Park are supposedly influenced by party patronage in the form of jobs made available to them.

Morton agreed with an audience member who speculated that increased investigative reporting was a result of public frustration with the way the economy is going.

Camp argued that the press was too powerful and with the present laws governing the press it is "open season on politicians." He questioned the motives behind investigative reporting, expressing his opposition to the creation "of an instant mythology based on assumptions."

On top of this he indicated that he would be unhappy if Watergate led to a public demand for a more "alert" press. As it is politicians have to lie to protect their own skins. Therefore, a stronger press will just create more distortion, he concluded.

In general, the conference focussed on the printed media. Lack of time was seen as one factor for unfurnished coverage. As one person said, the daily newspaper is "history on the run." Big business and the capitalist system were isolated as factors for bias but the conference took only a superficial look at them.

Gays fight bias

The Gay Alliance toward Equality (GATE) presented a brief last Thursday at the city's Urban Renewal Housing Fire and Legislation Committee supporting a resolution that the City of Toronto not discriminate in hiring, promoting, or firing on the basis of sexual orientation.

The resolution passed the committee unanimously.

GATE has been lobbying politicians at City Hall since the beginning of the summer, and has approached the City Hall locals of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) for support against policies that discriminate because of an employee's sexual habits.

GATE is focussing attention on two kinds of legal changes — elimination of discriminatory laws in immigration regulations and the criminal code, as well as inclusion of protection against sexual discrimination in the human rights code and the Canadian Bill of rights.

20,000 said killed

OTTAWA (CUP) - There have been between 20,000 and 25,000 deaths already in Chile since the bloody coup of September 11 according to the testimony of the first three Quebecois to return from Chile.

They hope their testimony will incite the Quebec people to demonstrate to force the Canadian government to break off ties with the new Chilean government.

Yesterday the Canadian government recognized the junta government for what it calls the safety of the Canadian people presently in Chile.

The Quebec Chile Committee is mounting its campaign of solidarity. The committee was formed by the three largest labour unions the CNS, FTO, and the CEQ solidarity movements, and the secretariat of Quebec-American Latine.

One Mexican journalist who managed to get to Argentina reported to have seen a stadium in Chile full of prisoners who were waiting to be deported to deserted Magellan Islands. Concentration camps are being built on these islands.

The Air Force has been bombing factories where workers have boarded themselves, with one factory alone having five hundred dead. Soldiers have been ordered to sack libraries to burn all suspect literature and rid Chile of Marxist teachings.

In the wake of the Canadian government's decision to recognize the military junta government in Chile, over 60 people met Sunday afternoon at Hart House to officially found the Chile Solidarity Committee, and to establish its program.

Central to the committee's work will be agitation for an end to repression in Chile, a campaign for the freeing of political prisoners and amnesty for refugees.

A newly elected twelve person steering committee was given the responsibility of preparing and organizing ongoing activities to win support for the struggle against the military coup. These are to include talks on campuses, leafletting, public meetings and demonstrations.

A rally was slated for October 18 to which Quebec trade union leader Micheal Chartrand was to be invited in preparation for a national day of protest planned for the end of October. This is being done in co-ordination with committees in Winnipeg, Regina, Vancouver, Montreal and Quebec City.

Library workers strike at Sir George Williams

MONTREAL (CUP) — U of T administration has had many problems in the past with library policy. Disagreements between students and administration as to who should be allowed to use the university libraries have resulted in occupations and arrests, while the issue still isn't completely solved satisfactory to both sides.

One problem U of T hasn't had lately is a strike by library workers, who appear satisfied. This is not the case in Montreal, where library workers at Sir George Williams University have been on strike for a week to back pay demands.

Administration officials at Sir George are persisting in their refusals to meet the demands of the workers. Their excuse is that, when drawing up their budget this year, they forgot the library contract was due to expire.

"They want us to forget our salary increases, but we don't want to have to pay for their mistakes," said Michel Latulippe, the Confederation of National Trade Union (CNTU) negotiator for the library workers' union.

After seven months of almost futile negotiations, the CNTU-affiliated library workers are demanding about 1000 more in individual annual salaries than the university is willing to offer.

Over 2,000 Sir George students have signed petitions supporting the workers, many classes have invited union representatives to speak, and some students are raising money for the strike.

The university administration and the union are also far apart on non-monetary matters.

The administration has refused to discuss other contract issues until the problem of salaries is settled. The union insists that many of the non-monetary issues are integral to the discussion of salaries.

Library workers at Sir George Williams University walked off the job to protest stalemate with management

The administration has refused to provide the union with information about the upcoming merger of Sir George and Loyola College. Even though a board of trustees has been selected and final arrangements for the merger are obviously underway, the Sir George administration claims it knows nothing about the merger's future.

Information about the merger is important to the library workers because Sir George is in downtown Montreal and Loyola is in the westend suburbs. Union representatives fear that, when the merger is completed, the Sir George library workers will be required to work at Loyola, substantially increasing their travelling time and expense.

Meanwhile, the university administration is challenging the right of one of the union's negotiators to be a union member. Nancy Marrelli, a secretary to the Chief Librarian, is in a position of a confidential nature and therefore cannot be a union member, the administration claims.

Peter Page, another union negotiator, feels "the university is acting in very, very bad faith" to challenge Marrelli's membership at this time. He says their action against Marrelli is indicative of the university administration's attitude toward the union.

"The university is not taking us seriously," he concluded. Another disagreement involves job descriptions. Marrelli said the university has "added things to the job qualifications. For example, many of us now need to know Russian and Spanish whereas only a few books in these languages are catalogued each year. Others are expected to type four words a minute in jobs where no typing is required, or must have a BA where that level of education is just not needed.

Olympic pillage

MONTREAL (CUP) — Tender specifications for the 1976 Olympic village are expected to be announced any day now despite mounting protest from Montreal city hall employees.

City Executive Committee Chairman John Lynch Staunton said Thursday that the Drapeau administration's position on the village is still that it be built on one site—the east end Viau Park Golf Course.

Two weeks ago, Guy Legault, Director of Housing and City planning for Montreal submitted a report to council condemning the use of Viau Park as the site for the village, which is to be used after the games as a housing complex.

In an open letter to the mayor last week, 27 of the 34 employees in Legault's department supported his stand and asked the mayor to reconsider alternative sites.

This site, isolated from the community services essential to the proper functioning of a normal urban area, would make it extremely difficult and expensive to integrate such a complex into the surrounding neighbourhoods.

Drapeau's plans call for a single village—housing 10,000 athletes on the fifty acre site.

But part of Legault's report included a planning document from August 71 which noted that if a single village was built it would require at least 119 acres to build a complex that would be self-sufficient.

As early as August 1971 the planning department proposed a network of olympic villages that would maximize use of existing community facilities and supplement them when necessary.

These villages would be built at six different locations at an average distance of 1.25 miles from the main stadium; each village would have its own complement of facilities, gymnasiums, playing fields, medical clinics, recreation rooms, cafeterias etc.

At an average density of 62 housing units per acre, it would be possible to build 5,800 on the six sites—since only 4,000 housing units are called for at this time, this option provides considerable flexibility should needs be revised upwards.

Drapeau's plans would also leave a housing complex that would be isolated from the rest of the city in what is essentially a non-residential district.

Political refugees face dangers in Chile

By PAT ELLIS

A tenants' union from a Ward-7 apartment building on Bain Avenue are testing a recent Toronto bylaw which allows a landlord to evict a tenant if a landlord has proven delinquent in fulfilling work orders outstanding on his property.

With the backing of Alderman John Sewell, the Bain Avenue Apartments Tenants Union brought their appeal for the application of the new law before the city's Urban Renewal, Housing, Fire and Legislation Committee yesterday.

Bain Avenue Apartments were built in 1918 with city funding. The buildings were to be for the working poor and were vaunted at the time as an example of what society could do.

The tenants charged that it has since "become the private domain of Mark Thames" who is the current owner through a company called Toronto Housing Corporation Ltd.

In the past three years, virtually no repairs have been made on the fifty-five year old buildings but at the same time Toronto Housing was taking out mortgages on the place to finance other developments.

Last January housing inspectors issued work orders against the project and set a six month period in which the place would have to be brought up to standards. Since then, the tenants say, the work has not been done as required. In distinct violation to laws protecting tenants, rents were raised to cover costs of repairing the premises.

At the same time the city Director of Housing Standards, Jack Bradford appeared to be working more agreeably with the absentee landlord's corporation than with the people who had to occupy the place.

At the committee meeting yesterday, one of the tenant deputies argues that Bradford was in collusion with Toronto Housing Corporation.

Much was said by committee members and others, but the matter of accusations against a city employee (Bradford) was bounced up to the city's Executive Committee.

The tenants went on to show photographs indicating the sort of renovations that had been carried out.

Much of the work that has been done is purely cosmetic. Porches and sidewalks have been fixed and internal difficulties neglected. One of the neater pieces of work is a rotten fence that housed a large society of termites. Termites and rot were duly painted over.

Some major renovations were done to untenanted apartments. These however, were being repaired for occupancy by more moneyed people who, as one committee member, put it, "could afford to live anywhere in the city."

What became apparent at the URFHL Committee was the negligence of a landlord and, more importantly, proof of the reluctance of Bradford to uphold tenants rights.

The committee did not decide to enforce the new bylaw at this time, but, in a motion by Ward 6 Alderman Dan Heap, deferred the matter for two weeks.

At the end of two weeks, the tenants and other interested parties will submit work orders, and evidence of the amount of work actually done. The test of the city's new bylaw will be put off until then.

Portuguese colony liberated

Last Monday, September 24, a National People's Assembly meeting inside the Portuguese colony of Guinea-Bissau declared the country an independent and sovereign state.

The assembly also announced the election of a Council of State of 15 persons and the election of Luis Cabral, brother of slain guerrilla leader, Amilcar Cabral, as first President. The PAIGC (African Party for the Independence of Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands) had held elections in June and July of 1972 to form the National People's Assembly made up of 120 elected delegates.

The independence declaration of the west-African state was announced simultaneously in Senegal and Guinea-Conakry, the independent countries bordering Guinea-Bissau on the north and south. Already 21 countries have recognized the new government. The first to extend recognition was Guinea-Conakry, Algeria, and Upper Volta. Yugoslavia was the first non-African state to recognize the new republic.

The declaration of independence came only eight months after the assassination of Amilcar Cabral who had led the PAIGC since its foundation in 1956. It came 15 months after national elections had been held in the liberated areas.

Cabral had said at that time that the elections were a major step toward the declaration of a sovereign government. In 1959, after the massacre of striking dock workers, Cabral led the party away from peaceful protest to a strategy of guerrilla warfare based in the rural areas where 90 percent of the country's 800,000 people live.

Guerrilla action against the Portuguese was initiated in 1963 after intensive political preparation by the PAIGC. It was Cabral's belief that "the people's struggle for national liberation and independence has become a driving force of progress for humanity."

Visitors to liberated areas have consistently been impressed by the progress made in construction of schools and dispensaries, and the creation of producers' co-operatives.

The declaration is bound to increase attention on the war Portugal is fighting against similar liberation movements in Angola and Mozambique.

Countries like Canada and other NATO members which give tacit and material support to NATO-member Portugal will now be faced with a decision about recognizing the nationalist government. Canada's official policy is to recognize governments in control of the territory they claim.

A UN mission to Guinea-Bissau in 1970 found the areas it visited completely under nationalist control. Journalists have calculated that the entire country except for the coastal strip, a few towns, and military outposts are under PAIGC control.

The Portuguese have always disputed these claims, but recently have admitted to losing several aircraft to Soviet-built surface-to-air missiles launched by the PAIGC.

For its part, the PAIGC has asserted ability to attack the towns, but says it rejects that tactic because it would cost the lives of too many innocent Guineans.

Bylaw to be tested

A precarious situation exists in Chile today for more than 10,000 political refugees from right-wing Latin American military dictatorships, according to the U.S. Senate Subcommittee on Refugees.

The right-wing military junta which 18 days ago resulted in the death of the democratically-elected President Salvador Allende and many of his aides in the Popular Unity Government, has called on all foreigners, including the leftist political refugees, to register with the police.

The refugee population in Chile prior to the coup included at least 5,000 Brazilians. They had fled arbitrary imprisonment, torture and death by a military dictatorship which seized their country with U.S. complicity in 1964, to prevent the advance of a popular regime which had threatened business interests.

Many Canadian students will remember the exiled Brazilian student-leader Jean-Marc Vonder Weid, who travelled and spoke here a year ago. He is believed among Brazilians caught in Chile. Of the remaining 6,000 refugees, the great majority are Bolivians and Uruguayans, whose countries have become dictatorships modeled on Brazil due to pro-U.S. military coups in 1971 and 1973, respectively. The refugee population also includes small groups from other countries such as Haiti, the Dominican Republic and Paraguay.

Most of the political refugees, according to the Senate Subcommittee, can be characterized as young professionals and students who had opposed the reactionary regimes from which they fled. Once they arrived in Chile, some of the refugees received scholarship support to study in Chilean universities.

The claim of ignorance might be a convenient smokescreen for a plan to decimate the anti-fascist resistance of Latin America. The Chilean generals may well wish to use such an "achievement" as their calling card when they present diplomatic credentials in Brazil, Uruguay, Bolivia and in other countries governed by like-minded reactionary regimes.

The danger of widespread massacre of the refugees and of deportation to certain imprisonment or death in their home countries has led several U.S. organizations and political figures to appeal in behalf of these people, for freedom to leave Chile alive and without harassment or persecution. Pleas have come from Senators Gale McGee and Edward Kennedy as well as various religious organizations, including a Panel on International Affairs of the United Methodist Church.

The General Secretary of the World Council of Churches, Philip Potter, telegraphed the junta, and the UN Security Council on behalf of the refugees, with five Nobel laureates reinforcing the appeal. Canadian Roman Catholic, Anglican and United Church leaders have appealed for safe conduct and asylum for these people to Mitchell Sharp. Quebec labor organizations, student and community groups across the country have also made the safety of these people a primary demand in messages to the Canadian government. Some academics are seeking possible job placements in Canada for scholars endangered in Chile.

Native people have right to determine own destiny

Native youth leader defends Ottawa occupation

By Tim Gallagher

Art Manuel president of the Native Youth Association, declared that native people "have a right to determine their own destiny within a framework of their own thinking."

He was speaking Friday evening at a forum held in Toronto by the Young Socialists to consider the day-long occupation of the Indian Affairs Department which the Native Youth Association organized in Ottawa last August.

First outlining the organization's history, Manuel pointed out that the association had followed government guidelines in the past, but more recently it has demanded the right for native people to spend their own money as they see fit. Manuel rejected what he called the myth that native people receive government hand-outs.

Already, he mentioned, they have paid once in the destruction of their lands, their culture, their treaties, and their political system. Now they are paying again in the form of taxes. In return, only a few government services are offered. Of the money that is returned to native people, Manuel pointed out that most of it is recirculated into the economy. Little remains on the reserves. In fact, only business interested benefit from the existing guidelines as money is needed to organize people and resources and to send speakers to communities all over Canada. However, native people innovate their own cost-saving measures in order to stretch out the money.

In addition, government guidelines promote spending which does not improve the socio-economic or political condition of the reserves. Wayne Stonechild, a speaker representing the Native Youth Movement in Saskatchewan, said the government would "rather see our people on welfare than holding jobs."

Native organizations including this one have been stressing self-reliance through their own leadership programmes. Government refusal to allow them to run their own affairs led to the occupation of the Indian Affairs Dept.

Manuel said the occupation also focussed public attention on four other grievances. It protested the James Bay project, the denial of the Jay Treaty rights, which allows natives to cross the U.S.-Canadian border freely, the refusal of the government to return lands to native people in British Columbia, and the continuance of the Native Youth Liaison Specialist Programme.

Referring to James Bay, Manuel stressed that the Crees in this area have their own distinct cultural and economic system. A different language and way of thought made it hard for them to understand the white man's actions. The Cree, he reaffirmed, do not think in terms of dates, deadlines, or dollars and cents. Therefore, it was hard for them to grasp what was happening as a result of Premier Bourassa's action through Quebec Hydro. To understand the Cree, he said you have to understand their language.

As the project continues and people see the danger, Manuel said, unorganized sabotage is taking place, which the government calls vandalism. It is expected that efforts to block the James Bay project will become more militant and much more organized. Few results are expected from bargaining with federal and provincial political parties, he said.

However, the association in its efforts to become self-sufficient, is looking for support from other groups in society. Stonechild added to this by revealing that native prisoners in their fight against prison officials found they had a "common struggle with their White brothers" who were also prisoners.

The Native Youth Liaison Specialist Programme was labelled as a group-welfare policy by Manuel. It was initiated by a Montreal millionaire and encouraged native people to undertake projects under OFY and LIP. This would only lead to further dependence upon the government.

The occupation was not intended to win all the demands. What is sought to do was unite native people in their struggle against crimes committed against them. From the response so far, Manuel feels that this has been successful.

The native population, however, does not want to withdraw into its own world. Rather, as the speakers said the native people expect to contribute to the world as they have done in the past.

Future struggles are inescapable and before native people can attain their just place in society, they may likely end up fighting the RCMP and the army who the speakers described as "the most repressive forces in society."

U of T does well at track meet

McMaster hosted its annual track and field meet this weekend in Hamilton. No team standings were compiled, but individuals from the U of T won or placed highly in most events, boding well for the upcoming finals in Kingston.

A very small women's team stretched its resources to produce the following: 200 metres - Janet Fletcher 5th (28.2); 4 x 100 metres relay - Louise Hanna, Fletcher, Brenda Mills, Lesley Evans 4th (53.9); 800 metres - Evans 1st (2:24.4); Caroline Hebblethwaite 3rd (2:29.7); high jump - Hanna 1st (5'9"); javelin - Fletcher 5th (72'1"). Last year the U of T had no women's track and field team.

The men fielded a larger squad, and would have won easily had team scores been kept. Individual results were: high hurdles - Avo Albo 2nd (16.0); Doug Reid 6th (16.5); intermediate hurdles - Albo 2nd (56.7); Rick Cunningham 3rd (56.8); 100 metres - Reid 2nd (11.1); Bob De Groot 4th (11.3); 800 metres - Frank Agnazio 1st (1:54.5); Gerry Peeney 2nd (1:54.7); 1500 metres - Greg Lockhart 1st (3:57.0); 5000 metres - John Sharpe 1st (14:46); mile relay - 1st, 2nd, 3rd; high jump - Mike McVarish, Carl Georgovski, Dave Watt 1st equal (6'2"); triple jump - Watt 1st (47' 10"); Keith McKenzie 2nd, McVarish 3rd; pole vault - Ron Nastuk 1st (13' 4"); Steve Godfrey 2nd, McVarish 3rd; Shot put - Roman Preobrazenski 1st (46' 1-34); Reid 4th; discus - Reid 2nd (144'); Preobrazenski 3rd (130').

The women's next meet is the coming weekend in Waterloo: the men travel the weekend after to Western.

Film from China illuminating

A rare view of the Chinese revolution's inner character was shown at Hart House Thursday when the film "Red Flag Canal" was screened by Dr. James Endicott, a founder of the Canadian Peace Congress.

Dr. Endicott received the film as a personal gift — complete with English subtitles — from his long-time friend, Premier Chou En-lai, during his January visit to China.

Intended as a propaganda film showing the triumph of the peasant masses and the thoughts of Chairman Mao, it shows the dramatic story of the construction of 1,530 km (about 956 miles) of waterways in the northern province of Hoan to bring water to the drought-plagued Linshien.

The waterway is one of the landmark engineering feats since the 1949 revolution and was built over nine years with virtually no sophisticated machinery.

Most of the scenes of the film show large numbers of peasants working with shovels, sledgehammers and steel rods. The self-reliance and ingenuity of the peasants is a particularly fascinating aspect of the portrayal.

The film shows the construction and completion of the canal in the light of the struggle and triumph of the peasants and the line of Chairman Mao over both physical obstacles and the conservative line called "the evil wind of Liu Shao-chi". One of the most impressive aqueduct structures is called the "Evil Wind Bridge" to commemorate this struggle and triumph.

The people of the villages of this county mobilized themselves to construct aqueducts, tunnels and canals in order to bring water from the Changho, a river some 15 km. (about 9.4 miles) from the areas of worst drought, through a rugged range of low mountains. The peasants of this area now enjoy plenty of water all year round and a crop yield 32 times greater than before the completion of the canal in 1969.

America dries up

The rising wave of Canadian nationalism again reared its head yesterday when a Varsity staffer specifically pressed the "America Dry" button on the Varsity pop machine. To his utter amazement, a can of Canada Dry tumbled out of the machine.

A spokesman for the Canadian Liberation Movement termed the pop episode "a momentous defeat for US imperialism."

Safeway restricted

CALGARY (CUP) — The supreme court of Alberta has ordered Canada Safeway to reduce its domination of retail food marketing in Calgary and Edmonton.

The order is a compromise between government prosecutors and the company. Safeway had been charged with monopoly practices in the two cities from 1965 to 1972.

Counsel for Safeway told the court the company was accepting the order without pleading guilty or being found guilty.

The court order will prevent Safeway from continuing its "market-saturating advertising" and prohibit it from making leases that prevent competitors from opening stores in Safeway's vicinity.

Safeway will not be allowed to expand any of its grocery stores in either city for three and half years and, during this time, will be allowed to open only one new store in each city. The following year it will be allowed to open two stores in each city.

For the next six years, Safeway must charge uniform prices in all its stores.

Canada Safeway operates more grocery stores in the two Alberta cities than all of its competitors combined and is a subsidiary of the American Safeway Company which is the second largest supermarket chain in the U.S.

It is the largest food store chain in western Canada with 91 stores in British Columbia and 154 on the prairies. There are a total of 201 supermarkets in British Columbia and 248 on the prairies. Canada Safeway had a profit of $18 million in 1972.

The 76 points scored in Saturday's football game in Varsity stadium between Windsor and Toronto set a new OUAA record, eclipsing the old mark of 75, set in 1964 when McGill cleaned Western 56-19. The CIAU office in Ottawa announced the first ranking of the top ten intercollegiate football teams in the nation this week: 1. Saskatchewan; 2. Ottawa; 3. Western; 4. Alberta; 5. Manitoba; 6. Laurier; 7. Queen's; 8. Windsor; 9. Loyola; 10. Acadia. Toronto has already lost to Windsor and Queen's and has yet to play Queen's again, Ottawa, and Western. Miracles would seem to be in order to make the play-offs.

Soccer Blues seem to be making up now for a slow start to the season, but they have plenty to worry about still. Laurentian appears to have a powerhouse this year, led by former professional Bruno Pilas.

In rugby the Blues are looking strong for a run at the OUAA title. Early results suggest that defending champions Western, who beat Waterloo 24-3 and McMaster 6-0, and York, who beat RMC 20-0, in their first games, are going to be the teams Blues must bet by.

The U of T ailing team came third in the McMaster meet in Oakville over the weekend. Dave Bussin and Colin Andrews sailed in the A division; in the B division it was John Lazier and Tom Shenstone.

Final standings were Queen's, 18.5; RMC, 25.25; Toronto 30.25; Trent; Waterloo; McMaster. Next weekend one team travels to Detroit to defend the J.L. Hudson Memorial Trophy won last year by Toronto. Another crew will go to New London, Connecticut, where the US Coast Guard is hosting the Danmarck Trophy.

Windsor scrapes by Toronto in last minute

By PAUL CARSON

Windsor Lancers scored on a one-yard touchdown pass with only 23 seconds remaining Saturday to edge the Blues 39-37 in an exciting football game that was at once a fan's dream and a coach's nightmare.

The Varsity defence had already held on two plays from within their 10-yard line, but on third down Windsor quarterback Bob O'Riley passed to flanker Brian Plenderleith for the winning points. The Lancers' defensive unit then sealed the victory with an interception off Wayne Dunkley's desperation deep pass in the final five seconds.

For spectators, the game had everything they could wish — sensational touchdowns, exciting long passes and broken-field running, outstanding kicking, and numerous spectacular individual efforts. For coaches, there was everything they don't want to see — endless mental errors and missed assignments, blocked kicks, foolish penalties, scoreboard malfunctions, fumbles, and inconsistent officiating.

Most post-game comments centered on second-guessing Varsity strategy of using a short kickoff following Mark Ackley's touchdown that gave Blues a 37-32 lead with 2:14 remaining in the fourth quarter.

The decision, though risky, was far from reckless since Lancers would hardly be expecting such a play with so little time remaining. If Blues coaches can be faulted on the call, it would be for not using more halfbacks and receivers on the kicking unit since as the play developed, the closest Varsity player to the ball was a lineman and he was unable to control the crazy-bouncing ball, perhaps because his hands were taped.

Thus, a good idea backfired as Windsor recovered near midfield and with almost surgical precision moved in to win the game. It was somewhat of an injustice for Blues' defensive unit which had played well for most of the afternoon, producing three turnovers and providing the Varsity offense with excellent field position on several occasions.

The lead changed hands eleven times in the see-saw game and Blues clung to a narrow 24-23 advantage going into the wild fourth quarter which saw the teams score a total of thirty points.

With a gusting wind at his back, Windsor punter John Alexander then put his team ahead with two singles within four minutes, the first on a booming sixty-yard kick and the second on a routine effort which the Varsity punt returners misplayed into a single point.

However, Windsor's exuberance lasted barely more than a minute as Dunkley evaded a Lancer blitz and fired a perfect long pass against the wind to Ackley who was at least fifteen yards in the clear.

Don Thomson's convert gave Blues a 31-25 lead which survived until 11:20 when O'Riley hit end Augie Sartor on a short crossing pattern and Dave Hillier converted to put Lancers ahead 32-31.

That lead lasted only 86 seconds as halfback Cor Doret passed to flanker Brent Elsey for a long controversial gain which the officials called correctly right in front of the Windsor bench. Lancers were still fuming about the ruling when Dunkley passed to Ackley at 12:46. Thomson's convert attempt was ruined by a high snap and the much-debated ensuing short kick-off set the stage for the denouement.

The loss spoiled another outstanding display by veteran Cor Doret who scored three touchdowns and provided the impetus to Toronto's struggling running attack in addition to his key pass to Elsey. Doret also led Varsity pass receivers in catches with eight for 65 yards.

Dunkley atoned for last week's poor performance against Queen's by completing 17 of 27 passes as Blues' aerial attack amassed 300 yards compared to Windsor's 153.

Defensive captain Hartley Stern turned in another solid game, setting up the team's first touchdown with a pass interception, and corner linebacker Rick Nakatsu blocked a punt.

However, to their credit, Lancers had done an excellent scouting job and their tough running attack produced 256 yards compared to Blues' net total of 118. O'Riley concentrated on a roll-out passing formation that continually confused the Varsity secondary and he finished with 14 completions from 26 pass attempts. Halfback Jim Wakeman was the most impressive Windsor runner, carrying 18 times for 169 yards including the game's opening touchdown and later a 78-yard burst in the third quarter to set up another score.

Windsor relied on short passes, particularly on key second and third down gambles which saw the Blues unable to cover their halfbacks flaring out of the backfield.

Wakeman capped a four-minute drive off the game's opening kick-off but Blues retaliated with two Doret touchdowns within 67 seconds, the second coming when Varsity's kicking unit forced a Windsor fumble on the kickoff return.

Moe Cousineau, a lineman turned into a fullback for the game, tied the score for Windsor at 14-14 with a short plunge midway through the second quarter. Blues gambled and lost near midfield in the final seconds of the half and Alexander gave Lancers a psychological boost with a single at 14:59 when Varsity punt returners inexplicably allowed his perfectly angled punt to bounce over the goal line and out of bounds for a single point.

Varsity regained the lead in the third quarter from Doret's third touchdown but Cousineau scored again to erase that and Alexander, on his way to a brilliant 44.5 yard punting average, collected another single.

Thomson maintained his solid kicking record with a 30-yard field goal that put Varsity ahead 24-23 and that set the stage for the painful but memorable final quarter which may have buried Varsity's playoff hopes. With a 2-2 record after four games, they'll need some help from other teams to overtake Queens and Ottawa.

POINTS AFTER — the stats were as close as the score — each team had 25 first downs and Blues led on total offense by only nine yards, 418 to 409...Ackley caught five passes for 124 yards and Elsey nabbed four for 58...each team finished the game two men short as Marcel Marchard and Jim Nicoletti were ejected for fighting in the third quarter while Leon Suddick and Walt Dudar were injured...Blues try again this Saturday against luckless Waterloo at the Stadium at 2 p.m...attendance seemed to be about 4,000 give or take 50 drunken engineers either way.

Soccer Blues wipe Waterloo Warriors, 6-1

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues continued their newly-found goalkicking ways by overwhelming the host Waterloo Warriors 6-1 on Saturday. As the Warriors brought an unbeaten record into the game, the result augurs well for the Blues who face three difficult games in the next week.

From the start the Warriors were forced to defend against an eager Toronto squad. With Carmen Marcantonio operating in midfield, Tim Burns was able to move to a more defensive position than in previous games. The overall effect of these changes was to give a solid midfield base from which the forward line could operate with increased effectiveness.

After 11 minutes a corner kick on the right was taken by Peter Hillier. The Warriors' defence, distracted by the threatening presence of Blues tall defender, Geoff Crewe, near to their goal left the shorter Marcantonio uncovered. He met the cross and, unimpeded, headed the ball into the top left-hand corner of the net.

With the tonic of an early goal

Blues set about imposing mastery on the game. Vito Polera, on the left, and Vince Ierullo, on his right wing, sorted, used their speed to great effect in outrunning the slow Waterloo backs. Once the defenders had been left behind, these players either shot themselves or, drawing the more effective centre back out of position, passed off to their inside colleagues for them to shoot.

The next two goals demonstrated each of these facets of play. After 27 minutes Burns hit a low through ball inside the Warriors' left back for Ierullo, moving at speed on the back's outside, to run onto and collect. Without more ado Ierullo shot a low ball past the goalkeeper's right.

Then, from a left side throw-in, Allen Caramancio outran his covering right back and slung a low pass across goal. Ierullo, although receiving the pass with his back to the Waterloo net, had time to turn and hit a rising shot beyond the goalkeeper's left. As half-time approached Blues enjoyed the luxury of a three goal lead; it was a luxury they had earned.

Probably on account of overconfidence, Blues did not commence the second half with similar forthright play to that employed so effectively prior to the interval. However, the defence muzzled any attempts by the Warriors to reduce the deficit with Iain Slimmon and Bob Cazolla, in direct contrast to the Waterloo backs, exerting their authority over attacks directed down the wings. So, despite few dangerous thrusts from the Toronto team, Bob Judd's goal was not endangered as a result of the Warriors' midfield dominance.

Dave Evans, brought in at 67 minutes to operate on the left, broke the second-half stalemate by scoring almost immediately. Intercepting a errant pass by a Warrior defender, he dribbled directly to goal only to see his low drive hit the diving 'keeper's body. The ball rebounded to Evans who made no mistake with his second shot.

Only six minutes later another rebound error by the Waterloo rearguard was converted into a goal by Ierullo, who seized the chance to hit a looping shot which the goalkeeper was able to tip, but not stop. Having scored his hat-trick, and taken quite a battering from the zealous, but ineffective attentions of the Warriors, Ierullo left the game; the home team's goalkeeper left too.

Blues' scoring was completed after 82 minutes by a superb goal. Jim Varelas moved the ball smartly down the right and hit a waist-high cross. It was met at full speed by Caramancio and efficiently directed into goal past a bewildered substitute keeper.

The final score, three minutes prior to the game's close, fell to the Warriors. A high pass was chased energetically by a Waterloo forward, but a strange bounce took it past both him and Judd, who had advanced from Blues' goal. The two players clashed and a penalty kick was awarded to the Warriors, which Less McBride converted. Hence goalkeeper Judd lost his first shutout in Varsity soccer by a narrow margin.

Profs want student voice

By KRIS SOSNOWSKI

Seven U of T professors surveyed by the Varsity say students definitely should be represented on staffing committees that make tenure and promotion decisions. The professors are members of the Faculty Reform Caucus.

"I am absolutely furious about the way our tenure committees are presently operated," says zoology professor R. Plowright.

The actual granting of tenure or promotions is done by independent college or dean's committees which base much of their decision on a recommendation made by the faculty or department to which the staff member in question belongs.

Professors are judged on their performance in research and teaching, with research given the higher priority in the present system. Teaching ability and effort are assessed sometimes through self-evaluation. The comments of colleagues are solicited and performance in seminars is considered.

Until this year there were no non-tenured members on tenure committees according to English professor S. Rosenbaum. U of T students have never been members of these committees and student course evaluations receive little attention.

In its August report the presidential task force on academic appointments recommends the creation of a university tenure committee with "modest" student and lay representation but as yet has been unable to devise an acceptable means of selecting students which could be applied in every department or faculty.

"The student viewpoint should be properly represented. It is absolutely essential that these committees hear students' opinions," says Plowright. He contends that a mechanism must be established whereby "students with fair and balanced judgements, not radical and political students" can be selected to sit on the committees.

"Absolutely!" says physics professor J. Prentice. "I don't think there is anything in the Haist rules which prevents students from being there as observers."

Although all feel that students have a definite contribution to make, none of the professors have any concrete suggestions as to how students, could be chosen to sit on the committees.

"The main problem is for the students to be truly representative," says mathematics professor E. Bsrbeau. "The student body would have to be much more aware of the issues than at the present moment."

There is a great need to revise the present methods of academic appointments. "We're very behind at the U of T," says Plowright, but adds that "it's very hard to judge teaching."

The professors vary in their comments as to the role of student course evaluations in tenure and promotion decisions. The general feeling is that they are limited in value and their use requires supplementation.

"It is very difficult to know how to go about assessing these things," says sociology professor N. Bell.

"There should be many kinds of information available. I have many doubts about the annual course evaluations." Bell conceives the central issue to be "what information is used in making the decisions, what criteria have been in fact used and will be used."

Rosenbaum also says that student evaluations "should be looked at," but it depends on how intelligent the evaluation is. "As they are now, they're not very helpful, only useful for singling out extremes."

"Students tend to be too kind. The general effect is a kind of blandness."

Bring on the dancing bears...

By MIKE EDWARDS

Monday evening's opening-night performance of the 1973 Arts and Science Faculty Council was a festive and gay affair. Working in the true spirit of such events at U of T Inc., the principal performers managed to sing and dance their way into the hearts of those loyal fans in attendance.

Professor J.E. Foley, in her role as chairwoman of the Committee to Implement the Beryne Report was the featured soloist. She sang a witty rendition of the famed Irving Beryne tune "God Bless the U of T, and scrap the New Programme."

A sour note was introduced by several unwashed and disheveled members of the chorus. Professor R.C. Plowright tried to introduce logic and reason to the assembly by weighing the "pedagogical merits" of the Beryne report against its "practical adversities." He managed to sing a few bars of "Proliferating Bureaucracies" to the group before being disposed of, with democratic dispatch.

Dave Laughton, on loan from the student body, was obviously singing out of tune throughout the two hour performance. His best song of the evening, "Whatever Happened to Academic Freedom" had some merit but was not well received by the audience.

Laughter broke out among the cast when Donald Ivey, prince of New College, forgot his lines. He attempted to introduce new wording into the Foley committee report. The chorus managed to cover for Professor Ivey's obvious lack of rehearsal with a few well chosen "bon-mots."

In all, the Foley performance was unforgettable — and, in her few attempts at dramatic presentation, she proved quite competent. Her handling of such difficult lines as "the term, specialist, is now used — so we'll use it" and "minor is better than sub-major", added new dimensions to the liberal arts. Her art-nouveau style touched off comparable performances from the rest of the cast.

Comic relief, always welcome at U of T performances, was handled well by the trio of Faculty Dean R.A. Greene, Secretary W.D. Foulds, and the newly elected "chairman," Professor W.K. Bryden. Their rendition of the old classic, "Pass the Buck" was a high point of the evening. They added a new wrinkle by passing on the responsibility of not losing exam papers onto the individual students involved.

The next gala performance of the Arts and Science New Programme Review — or Foley's Follies — will take place on October 10. Or was that October 11?

Canada ignores Chile refugees

By MARK BOHNEN

While thousands of workers and Allende supporters are being systematically rounded up and killed, the Canadian embassy has "locked their doors" to 250 to 300 political refugees seeking asylum, according to Tim Drainin, a member of the Latin American Working Group.

Speaking at a Waffle educational on the struggle of Chilean people, Drainin said that at least three of those turned down by the ambassador have been killed. At present the Canadian embassy harbors about twenty Latin Americans seeking asylum while the embassies of Mexico, Argentina and Panama harbor hundreds.

The refugees are Chilean leftists fleeing government repression after the Sept. 11 coup that changed the country overnight from socialist to military government. Refugees from other right-wing Latin American countries are also included in the purge.

Drainin learned from an External Affairs official that the Canadian government has accepted only two applicants to emigrate to Canada. The official is reported to have said that the Canadian government will not offer asylum to "free-loaders."

Drainin also learned that the Department of External Affairs has consented to shelter any person the United Nations referred to the Canadian ambassador. However, he reported that when a UN official asked the Canadian embassy to put up 200 refugees overnight, the ambassador "hemmed and hawed and demanded to know who they were." He subsequently denied them entry.

At the end of the educational Drainin read a resolution addressed to Mitchell Sharp which appealed to the government to take action to alleviate the plight of refugees escaping persecution. It was unanimously approved by the audience.

The resolution asks the government to: (1) open its doors to all Chileans requiring and seeking help; (2) admit to Canada all those who wish to come; (3) provide physical means, such as airlift aid, for refugees to reach safety.

These workers came to Queen's Park yesterday to protest unjust compensation. See page 3.

Workshop is no lemon

By LIZ MORRISON

Voluntary work in the community, related theory and self-discovery are the main elements of the Workshop in Community Involvement course run by Professor Jim Lemon of the Geography department.

Now in its fourth year, the course is offered as a second year interdisciplinary in any faculty.

Students choose a project, which need not be related to their own discipline, and work on it for a minimum of eight hours a week. The sixty or so students taking the course this year work on a wide range of projects depending on their interests and intended vocations.

Law students may work with Legal Aid or neighbourhood groups requiring assistance, while education-oriented students may help in free schools or with retarded and handicapped children. One student helps in an advisory bureau providing information on birth control and abortion.

All are welcome to the Christian Science Organization at U of T. Testimony meeting in the Woodger Room, Basement of the "Old Vic" Building.

The students have been divided into two groups — those who prefer to work with individuals and those who want to work on a wider scale, perhaps in the area of community health.

There are regular meetings at which the students report on their projects and when questions emerge relating to theory. However, the emphasis is on field work.

Students meet in groups of about twenty. Lemon feels that mixed interest groups are more valuable for the students because they become aware of the progress made in other projects and can compare problems and solutions.

Apart from the obvious value of the voluntary work being done, Lemon thinks the student will benefit greatly from self-discovery and self-assessment.

'Pragmatic' Anderson approach incurs wrath of Moses

SAC policy on discipline called 'pathetic'

By BOB BETTSON

Major differences are appearing in the Students' Administrative Council over how to deal with the new discipline code passed by the Governing Council last June.

Executive Assistant Art Moses issued a strong denunciation of the SAC policy on the code last August calling it "totally inadequate" and "pathetic." He recommended that SAC reject the code immediately and declare that it will refuse to recognize any decisions arising from it.

However SAC president Bob Anderson disagrees, favoring what he calls a "pragmatic" approach to the controversial code realizing its "inevitability."

Anderson and University Commissioner Alice Anjo have drawn up a proposed SAC interpretation of the controversial sections of the code that Anderson claims "the Governing Council can't ignore."

Anderson takes the position that despite the code's shortcomings, some sections will be an improvement from present procedures. He calls the present situation "chaotic" and characterized by "arbitrary action" on the part of faculty.

Moses maintains that the code should not be accepted until students are represented effectively at all levels of university decision-making including staffing decisions.

He explained that it is "the wrong time to accept the principle of a discipline code when such a repressive code is proposed."

The Anderson-Anjo paper however, puts forward a different strategy of offering a legal interpretation of some vaguely worded parts of the code stating "unless and until the Governing Council of the University of Toronto produces its own interpretation, students of the University of Toronto will proceed on the assumption that this interpretation is valid."

The controversial clause making it an offense to "disrupt intentionally, disturb or obstruct unduly authorized activities or functions held by the university" is seen by Moses as an attempt to suppress legitimate dissent. The Anderson-Anjo paper sets out a number of conditions which would have to be met before this section would come into operation and states that "failure to carry out these steps shall constitute grounds for acquittal".

Anderson maintained that the basis for interpretation is precedent and the interpretation SAC placed on it "seriously restricts the ability to apply this clause."

Anderson feels that on the whole "we can live with the code." He says that the tribunal system being set up to enforce the code with two students two faculty and an alumnus "protects students' rights far more than the present system."

Moses maintains that students are being asked to judge their fellow students on breaches of rules they had no role in making and opposes any recognition of the code until students play a role in making policy decisions.

The Anderson position is that "students will not feel bound by any regulation not approved by the Governing Council."

Moses feels that the SAC acceptance of the code with minor amendments was a mistake. "People didn't analyze the implications. They just accepted the liberal rhetoric. I don't think student leaders saw the code in its historical perspective."

This comes from his belief that the discipline code is basically the action of administrators and faculty who are "really worried about disruptions in the classroom and building occupations that challenge the way the university operates."

Pressure for the code began in 1968 when former university President Claude Bissell and the faculty began to worry about the threat of disruptive demonstrations. They proposed restructuring of the Caput, an all-faculty body that had very little legitimacy in the eyes of the students.

Finally SAC agreed to send representatives to sit on a committee to formulate a new discipline policy. The Campbell report, that came out in 1969, was a liberal document that recommended that "students and faculty reach operational agreement in the classroom." The report also realized that non-violent obstructive demonstrations could be justified and not surprisingly the report was shelved.

Not surprisingly, administrators waited until the new Governing Council was formed with token student representation to push through a much tougher new code. Only eight students sit on the 50 member governing body.

Discipline has yet to be discussed this fall by SAC. Innis SAC representative, Mike Edwards, proposed a motion that was passed by the university commission stating that discipline problems should be solved through discussion by those people directly involved. The motion also reaffirms that "the university should be run by and in the interest of those who study here." Edwards feels that "too much authority is given to the Governing Council in the various positions taken by SAC."

Harthad Paul Cadario, former student member of the Governing Council, is the architect of the new discipline code, now being mulled over by SAC.

Angry workers disrupt Queen's Park again

By TIM CALLAGHER

Demanding "Full Compensation or a Job" 100 angry workers were met by police as they tried to enter the Ontario Parliament Buildings yesterday.

The demonstrators were from the Committee for a Just Compensation, a group of injured, largely immigrant workers who have been waging a nine-month struggle against the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Board (WCB). They converged on Queen's Park Tuesday afternoon to renew their demands for fair treatment. After being denied permission to enter the buildings and attend the opening of Parliament, they tried to force their way inside.

Several members of the committee managed to disrupt the legislature by draping a banner from the public gallery demanding immediate action on their demands.

During the summer continued pressure from the committee resulted in the firing of WCB chairman Bruce Legge. The WCB also agreed not to retain psychiatrist Dr. Ian Hector, a U of T professor, as a consultant. Hector was accused of "racism" by the committee for describing an injured Italian workman as being "culturally and personally predisposed to illness."

Speakers at the demonstration pointed out the frustrations of their fight with the government. One woman, continually stifled in her attempts to get her claim, said that "politicians only want us at election time, then they forget about us... they only look out for themselves". A Polish immigrant declared that there is little difference between her country and Canada - "there run by state, here run by capitalists".

The final speaker demanded that "such racists as Ian Hector should be kicked out of the medical school". It was felt that racist theories put forth by so-called psychiatrists hurt immigrant workers like those at the demonstration.

During the demonstration, people carried picket signs reading "WCB is 75 per cent disabled", "Justice, no charity", and "WCB hospital is a house of horrors." Many people present told of harassment and ill-treatment at the downtown WCB hospital.

People claimed that the government in its refusal to pay injured workers, hired psychiatrists to label injured workers as "crazy."

Rejecting the idea that a person may only be 15 per cent disabled, the crowd wanted full compensation or a job at a decent wage. Future struggles are expected.

Fern Guindon, Minister of Labor for Ontario, who ultimately held responsibility for WCB affairs refused to talk to the demonstrators. A delegate from the NDP was present to talk to workers but had no suggestions to help them in their fight with the WCB. People dispersed with the impression that the next fight would be with the whole system and not just with the party in power.

Who can forget the smell of stale popcorn and all those action-packed films preceded by Colin Corbett at his organ with blazing white tuxedo and matching smile? Well all that is forgotten, they want to tear down the old Carlton for another apartment building. See page 11.

ASSU elects exec

The Arts and Science Student Union Council last night decided to set up a committee composed of representatives from various course unions to consider how to reduce the cost of running course evaluations in the faculty.

Though only $5,000 was budgeted last year to finance the evaluations over $7200 was spent. The union has a budget of $18,000 to finance educational and political work in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The union also elected former SAC education commissioner Rick Gregory, Linguistics Course Union representative Brian Doherty, Innis student Ellen Palmer and faculty council representative Bob Bettson to serve on the executive. A fifth member will be elected later.

The union was formed last year after a SAC constitutional amendment in 1971 prevented SAC from intervening in individual faculties. In previous years SAC had spent much of its time organizing arts students.

The union is composed of representatives from the downtown colleges with the exception of St. Mike's, some student members of the Arts and Science faculty council and representatives from eight course unions.

Erindale pulled out last spring because the activities of the union have been confined to the downtown campus.

The budget of $18,000 is from the educational rebate of $2 per student paid to each faculty student organization from the $14 SAC fee paid by each student.

Discipline Code is vague, intimidating

The university's proposed new discipline code is a complex document with, we believe, considerable ambiguity and doubtful legality. The following editorial is the first of several editorials examining the code. While the following is more general, in future issues we'll attempt to deal with specific parts of this most complex document.

If the current referendum campaign for greater student voice in faculty hiring, firing, and promotion decision-making is a harbinger of a broad and serious attempt for change that could take on more militant forms, then it's useful now to consider the implications for students of the new discipline code in the arena of political action.

The new discipline code, approved by the Governing Council last summer and to come into effect in January, 1974, represents more than the systematic organization of behaviour for U of T students and employees. In the midst of carefully-worded guarantees of various basic 'rights and freedoms', and the condemnation of essay banks, theft, and other matters, we find a direct threat aimed at those who 'disrupt intentionally, disturb, or obstruct unduly any authorized activity', and at those who disobey any 'lawful order' given by university officials.

These phrases include words open to a purely subjective interpretation by those who will enforce the code. What is the precise legal meaning of the words 'disturb or obstruct unduly'? Such pseudo-legalisms are nothing more than an attempt to elevate the administration's law and order practices of the past to a status of legitimacy, enshrined in the 'established practices' of the institution.

The university and its members are part of society, and are subject to its laws generally, laws which have been enacted by powers above and beyond the administrators of this campus. The clauses aimed at disruption, if enforced in a real situation, raise the very real possibility of placing alleged offenders in a situation of double jurisdiction. When the police evicted students during the library occupation two years ago, criminal charges were laid. The present code, had it been in effect, would have subjected those students to penalties additional to those defined in the criminal code of Canada. And it is highly questionable whether such measures would have a leg to stand on, if tested in the courts.

However, we should not simply express shock and disapproval at the university's behaviour. The code is clearly designed to intimidate students, professors and employees from organizing the kind of active challenge to the administration's authority that we have seen in every one of the past five years: confrontations around day care rights, earlier disciplinary proposals, library access, and arbitrary firings in the mathematics department. The administration understands that if backroom manoeuvring fails to defuse such confrontations, overt repression remains the only alternative to capitulation to demands which, once publicized, become increasingly legitimate in the eyes of both students and the general population.

A discipline code was not required the last time the police were called onto campus; the present code is only an attempt to legitimize such actions in the future. Students and their elected officials must campaign now for the withdrawal of the discipline code, while remembering that the real test of its enforceability will come in the actions of those fighting for change.

'Unions dominated by careerists'

The Workers Action Movement held a recent convention in Detroit in response to the increasing militancy of Detroit auto workers. Many of the most militant workers from the northeastern US and eastern Canada attended. Included, among others, were steelworkers from Sudbury, about 55 workers from various industries in Toronto, railworkers who led the storming of Parliament Hill as well as Detroit auto workers.

These railworkers attacked the Canadian union campaign as both divisive and diversionary contrasting it with the need for a North American wide railway strike to maximize pressure on the bosses. Only this, one speaker asserted, could create the conditions leading to higher wages and better working conditions. He also attacked the N.D.P. as a party with middle class values, lacking in militancy or actual leadership. During the railworkers storming of Parliament Hill, NDP leader David Lewis had asked them to obey the injunction leave Parliament and return to work.

According to the speakers, North American unionism's role as a progressive force has dramatically declined. The strongly entrenched class unity between the capitalist business interests and union leadership is becoming increasingly more evident. No longer does one find, according to the speakers, militant union sponsored actions or radical union demands. In fact, even on the Canadian scene, most recent strikes such as the Hamilton garbage strike have seen union bureaucrats stifling all rank and file initiative.

The example stressed at the Conference was at the Mack Avenue Chrysler plant. Workers, led by WAM had wildcatted over the high death rate, the racist harassment of the predominantly black work force and bad working conditions. Workers occupied the plant and study groups were set up to discuss oppression, workers control and Marxism.

The UAW not only refused to support the strike but used the tools formerly used by the company to smash the strike themselves.

They achieved this by contacting all the union bureaucrats in the area and members of the local Ku Klux Klan to assist the police to attack the workers in the plant.

Not one auto worker in the Detroit area would assist the union. The occupiers had organized around the demands of better plant safety, no forced overtime, 30 hours work for 40 hours pay and busting the wage freeze.

UAW President Leonard Woodcock with his near $100,000 income said that he can live with the wage freeze.

The UAW was initially founded by militant Communist leadership, establishing union democracy, the eight hour day and a militant shop steward system. But as the union aged the CP's increasing revisionism and the societal ideology of exploitation for selfgain and profiteering destroyed its founding spirit.

The union movement at this point historically, has become dominated by a group of careerists easily bought off by the corporations. The company bosses, for their part, are more then pleased to save themselves millions of dollars in worker's wages for a few hundred thousand in union payoff. Rather then being a vanguard, union leadership now looks at their work as simply a job, enjoying their joint responsibility with the company bosses for the smooth running of things. Finally, injunctions for worker militancy or strike pay from long strikes would jeopardize their absurdly large salaries.

WAM is a group of workers devoted to fighting for 30 hours work for 40 hours pay. The reasons they cite for the paramountcy of this demand include 1) fighting the federal government for their demand would unite workers on a wide basis 2) resultant better style of life 3) lowering unemployment. Another WAM demand is for rank and file control of the union movement and ending racism.

Communist letter called an insult

There is nothing more offensive about a movement which tells us that humanity has a new world — socialism — to construct than the apologist positions taken to protect and idolize its revolutionary leaders. On the one hand, there is the long process of explaining to those we work and study with the meaning of this economic system (imperialism) which creates misery on an international scale; on the other hand, there is a dishonest, romantic compulsion to defend mistakes made by revolutionaries of the past and present. The letter to the editor by the president of the U of T Communist Club September 28, 1973 is an insult to honesty and the most important criterion of any progressive body of people — self-criticism. To imply that the ownership of the means of production by the state is the same thing as the management of those means of production by the working people who operate them is misleading and opportunistic.

Having recently returned from two Soviet bloc countries — the German Democratic Republic and Czechoslovakia — I would like to impress upon the CP Club that repression in east Europe is not merely a slander created by the Cold War press. Instead it is reality, and for a revolutionary to subjectively cling to the dream of Soviet socialism in 1973 — or the "building" of socialism — is apologist. Marx writes that the means of production must be seized by the workers in order that they can manage their own destinies. Right on, Marx. In the USSR there exists a social elite which safeguards the means of production — the Soviet state — but not mass management of them. Among students in Prague, farmers in Bohemia, workers in Leipzig there is much discontent and a feeling that they have been cheated. The Party representatives in many centres I was able to visit are often the most feared and distrusted members of the community.

I do not ascribe to the theory that we must protect the Soviet Union at all costs. What we want to be true must be separated from what is, in practice, true — not only for ourselves when we discuss developments in the USSR, China, Cuba or Chile, but openly. Small wonder that so many workers and students find the left shrouded in mystery.

To suppose that the only political developments taking place today in the Soviet Union are those within the Party is incorrect. Instead, there is anger in many sectors of the population at a system which purports to be constructing an egalitarian state but whose elite is consolidating itself.

(I know a high school history teacher in Czechoslovakia who, in 1968, publicly criticized the SU's reins on the Czechoslovak CP. In 1973 he is shovelling coal into the school's furnace, teaching certificate suspended.) There is bitterness that children of party members are given special consideration in choice of schooling. There is resentment that huge amounts of east European goods and resources flow into the USSR with no substantial returns. Women are pondering their dual role as workers in factories and their traditional role as wife in the home.

Sure, it is difficult and often discouraging not to be able to point at a country and say — "That is Socialism", on "That is a free, imaginative society in the making". However, it is crucial to see the mistakes that have been made in the USSR and elsewhere in order to present an honest scenario to those who have questions about socialism. False optimism often destroys the morale of a revolutionary organization.

Michael Fisher
UC II

Socialism doesn't deliver promises

Barbara Cameron's statement ignores the abundant testimony of individuals who have had the "privilege" of living under east European and Soviet brands of socialism and have lived to tell about it. And the similarities between practices — and sometimes ideology — of the Soviet government and Nazi Germany are so glaring that only a devout partisan of the Soviet Union would insist otherwise.

To move on to a more general topic, Capitalism rests on the pursuit of selfish interests — the profit motive. Two questions: are there any benefits which have accrued to society as a whole from the capitalist system? and has socialism offered a desirable alternative to capitalism?

Where free enterprise has flourished, standards of living have risen for all classes. The opportunity for an individual to fulfill his needs has increased with the multiplication of goods and services offered on the marketplace. Production has responded to consumer demands rather than to arbitrary goals set by state planning boards in socialist economies. Last, the capitalist system is the most effective means for coordinating fluctuating supplies of goods and services with changing demands.

What alternative has socialism offered? First, to parap. Koestler's wry comment to socialism: under capitalism man exploited man; socialism has reversed this. As far as achieving the benefits described above, socialism has proved to be an inferior system.

Ken Samberg

Course evaluations prevent crime

Regarding course evaluations, it surely needs to be said that these to my mind irritating pieces of paper are not the tool that they are commonly thought of as being; the instrument through which students might evaluate and change the system for better.

As any true-to-the-cause revolutionary knows, course evaluations are more truthfully creations spat forth from the shrink department, on request from corporation capitalists, actually to augment the power in elite traditions. The rationale being that any persecuted student will likely give vent to his emotions by merely circling an alphabetical character, printed on the course evaluation, as a substitute for his subconscious desire to mail his professor a poison-pen letter, or better, blow up the classroom.

Right wing blamed for military coup in Chile

By MARK BOHNEN

The economic and internal chaos that has beset Chile in recent years was promoted by right wing elements attempting to encourage military intervention, according to John Foster of the Latin American Working Group. He was speaking at an Ontario Waffle educational meeting last Sunday at Glendon College.

After Allende's election, Foster said, the Christian Democratic Party lost much of its moderate membership and formed a right wing "coalescence" with the National Party.

"The basic strategy of the opposition," he said, "was to work with whatever sectors they could co-opt in the army or in the petit-bourgeoisie to hamstring the economy of Chile, to create as much internal chaos and lack of control as possible and thus to promote a military intervention."

They also used their majority position in congress to block Allende's requests for credit financing, and efforts to nationalize over 100 large corporations, Foster said. Their actions finally culminated in bringing down a resolution calling Allende's government "illegitimate".

Despite these limitations and despite the heavily indebted economy he inherited, Allende achieved substantial reforms. Among other accomplishments Foster listed agrarian reform, housing and health programs and a reduction of unemployment. With income redistribution and growing consumer demand the consumption of beef, poultry and other food items increased in the first six months of 1972.

However, the middle class suffered a corresponding decrease in buying capacity and began to protest.

In addition to the political problems, Foster noted that Allende inherited a very shaky economy which was the second most indebted in the world. It survived on the basis of funds from such sources as the U S-backed Alliance for Progress. During the last few years, he said, Chile had to import an increasingly large supply of food — $200 to $400 million during the Allende regime.

"This meant that anything aimed for credit went to the heart of whatever the government was trying to do in terms of bettering the people's survival," he explained.

Describing U.S. intervention in Chile, Darcy Martin, a member of the Development Education Centre noted how the above factor enabled the US to initiate a policy of economic sabotage "aimed at squeezing Chile's balance of payments."

Martin noted that this approach was in keeping with the "low profile" strategy America adopted towards unco-operative countries after the American-Viet Nam crisis.

The plan formulated by the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, the CIA, and state department called for a ban on credit to Chile in order to create sufficient economic and political chaos to provoke an armed coup.

The first and most severe blow to the economy came when "Exim-bank", a bank that guarantees credits granted by private banks against risk of non-payment withdrew its credit loans from Chile. This bank, according to Martin, supplied with 600 million dollars worth of direct credit for 25 years. A "snow-balling" effect was created as Chile's credit status became uncertain. The World Bank cut off its credit and US Aid refused to contribute loans. Chile now owed debt payments of about 35 per cent of its probable foreign exchange earnings, said Martin.

Martin traced the problem of food shortages and inflation partly to Chile's dwindling foreign exchange.

The U.S. Martin noted, was probably also instrumental in creating political chaos in Santiago. At least seven Americans working in the US embassy were CIA agents. They instigated various assassination attempts by the right wing. Money from agents probably financed the long and costly truck owners' strike.

Lisa North, professor of Latin American studies at York University, discussing the Chilean military, noted that the US played a significant role in developing Chile's large and well-equipped military forces. In two decades, she said, the military received $175 million in aid. A large percentage of Chilean officers were trained at US bases in Central America, where they were instilled with anti-socialist ideology. North noted that the military alone received aid after Allende's election.

Andreas Papandreou, a former Greek cabinet minister and John Hutscheson, York University professor, both stressed the role of the US in instigating counter revolutions in various countries. According to Papandreou, "the Chilean, Greek, Dominican Republic Guatemalan experiences...were all aspects of one highly interrelated process on a global scale."

He explained that the local bourgeoisie in Chile which had played a decisive role in the coup was dependent on American capital.

He encouraged Canadians to fight for a free economy and join Chile by fighting the "forces of oppression" where they start.

Hutcheson asserted that "ultimately the only way to show our solidarity with Chile is to struggle for an independent socialist Canada."

Michael O'Sullivan, a student at the University of Saskatchewan, described an emerging mass based and popular movement in Chile. According to O'Sullivan, after the work stoppage of October 1972, the workers and peasants experienced a "massive increase in consciousness. Local committees began to take production, food distribution, price control and vigilance into their own hands."

Women who were forced from the confines of their homes, students from their schools, acquired a new "societal perspective" of their problems.

Fire interrupts Algonquin Park meeting

Ontario almost loses its opposition leaders

By DAVID SIMMONDS

Does the prospect of Ontario losing its two opposition leaders and the leading lights in its environmental lobby send a shiver up your spine?

It could have happened on Monday, as the third floor of the old St. Lawrence Hall was engulfed in flames during a meeting sponsored by the Algonquin Wildlands League.

The meeting was to have been the third in a series of public forums on Algonquin Park, following a policy statement on July 17 by provincial Resources Secretary Bert Lawrence. Other meetings have been held in Huntsville and Ottawa.

In his statement, Lawrence announced that the park would be run as an "average man's wilderness". Most importantly, he stated his commitment to multiple use within the park.

"There will not be any interruptions in the flow of forest products to the various manufacturing facilities involved", said Lawrence. In other words, logging was to continue, although the park was to be considered as wilderness, of a sort.

Lawrence's policy statement followed the final report of the Algonquin Provincial Park Advisory Committee, which sat from September 1969 to July 1973. The committee was asked to "study and advise the minister on such matters relating to the policy of the management of Algonquin Park as the minister refers to it". Lawrence accepted the great majority of the recommendations of this committee.

Among the more controversial recommendations of the committee were the creation of "scenic loop roads" within the park, reduction of the buffer zone around logging operations, and the creation of a Crown corporation to control lumbering within the park. That well known courreur de bois, John P. Roberts, was later named to head the Algonquin Forest Authority.

To some extent, the task force had its hands tied from the start. Rene Brunelle, Minister of Lands and Forests, at the inception of the committee, said that "there are many different uses made of the park, and we have a rare opportunity to plan its management and development within the multiple use framework to which the department is committed".

According to this statement multiple use (ie. logging) would continue no matter what the task force decided.

The Algonquin Wildlands League (AWL) has, since July, been organizing opposition to the government policy. NDP leader Stephen Lewis and later Robert Nixon of the Liberals, have both come out in opposition to the policy.

Premier Davis had declined to attend Monday's meeting, and it was not until 4 pm on Monday that a government representative was announced. He was Frank Miller, MPP for Muskoka. Both Lewis and Nixon were present.

However, only AWL president Jeffrey Miller got the chance to speak. And his tirade was rudely interrupted by the stately tinkling of the fire alarm, saving the government from its expected roasting.

The fire also proved a godsend for Nixon, who was heard to remark that "I've got Eddie Sargent taking pot shots at me down the 'street'. Presumably, the fire allowed him to go and defend his integrity.

Pop unliberated

It appears that, contrary to previous reports, there's a long way to go in the struggle to liberate the Canadian pop industry.

As Varsity readers undoubtedly recall, the liberation forces were thought to be on the verge of victory when a Varsity staffer pressed the "America Dry" button on the Varsity pop machine and got a can of "Canada Dry."

But, alas, it seems that this was just a ploy by the notoriously sneaky American imperialists to lull the vigilant Canadians into thinking the battle had been won. A mere two days after the Canada Dry incident, the same Varsity staffer pressed the same "America Dry" button, and, you guessed it, the American pop had infiltrated back into the machine.

Meds: brush up on US history

Canadian students writing the Medical College Admission Test, the general admission test for the U of T Faculty of Medicine, have been shocked to find questions pertaining to American history and politics.

It is an American standard test, and the questions require the applicant to the Faculty to be familiar with such bits of Americana as the Gadsden Purchase between the US and Mexico, and the powers of the US House of Representatives. The test would obviously favor an American applicant over a Canadian.

Dr. Steiner, Assistant Dean at the Faculty of Medicine, flatly insists however that those questions with an American slant are not considered in the grading of the examination.

In contrast, the Faculty of Law receives its general admission tests from Princeton sealed. They are returned to Princeton to be graded without anyone at the U of T Faculty of Law seeing them. No one there is familiar with the content of the questions.

Fired math prof can't get Extension job

Stephen Salaff, a popular teacher fired from his part-time position with the Mathematics Department last year, has not been reappointed to the Division of University Extension where he had taught a pre-university mathematics course since 1970.

Salaff reapplied to the extension division in April, but was not notified until August 30 when he received what he called a "curt letter of dismissal" from division counsellor J. A. MacMillan.

Although Salaff was not told explicitly why he was not rehired, he was informed by MacMillan in conversation that the decision followed consultations with the mathematics department.

Salaff also maintains that he was told by MacMillan that the extension division was an "autonomous body", although it wished to retain the "goodwill" of the mathematics department.

In a letter to acting director of extension, E. M. Greutznier, Salaff requested that he be told the grounds for his rejection, or be rehired to teach the course which begins this week. Salaff cites his qualifications, the "cordial relationship" he has had with the extension division since 1970, and "academic courtesy and ethics" as reasons why Greutznier should respond in this way.

Greutznier told The Varsity that Salaff would have to apply to the math department for the extension position. Although the division reserved the right to refuse nominees, because of its small size, it had to rely on nominations from various university departments for its staff, he said.

However, Salaff contends that he has "never had anything to do with the mathematics department" as far as his teaching post in extension was concerned, and that he had always forwarded his applications directly to the extension division for the three courses he taught before.

As far as Salaff's teaching ability was concerned, Greutznier said he had never received any complaints.

When Salaff was fired last year, and two other mathematics professors, Michael Mather and David Spring, were denied tenure, students occupied the math department offices for 11 days, and demanded that the three professors be rehired.

The math sit-in raised the issue of student participation in firing and hiring of professors, and the granting of tenure. The three professors had received favorable evaluations from students taking their courses, and a petition signed by over 1,000 mathematics students was sent to mathematics department chairman George Duff requesting the rehiring of the professors.

Students also petitioned for a "voice for both graduates and undergraduates in all departmental hiring and tenure decisions." They demanded that "a professor's teaching ability be made a 'prime factor' when hiring and promotions are concerned."

In response to the math sit-in, and student demands for participation in staffing decisions, U of T president John Evans established a task force, chaired by vice-president and provost Don Forster.

The recently released report of this task force rejects student participation on staffing committees and does not establish the mechanics by which student evaluations could influence staffing decisions.

In a mid-October referendum, SAC will be asking students to vote on whether students should have parity with faculty on committees considering staff hiring, firing and tenure.

Another petition is being circulated requesting that Salaff be granted a hearing on his dismissal from the mathematics department and the division of extension. Salaff was denied an open hearing last year on the grounds that it was an unusual and unprecedented procedure.

The petition also points out the unusual situation of part-time staff, who are not eligible for membership in the University of Toronto Faculty Association, and do not have access to "established rights of appeal within the university structure available to full-time staff."

The United Way comes under criticism

By DICK BROWN

A six-year-old smiles from her wheelchair, an ex-con makes it going straight, a fatherless boy goes to his first hockey game, or a blood-spattered accident victim is saved by being whisked to hospital in an ambulance.

The United Way was there, and none of it could have happened without the generous giving of the working people of Toronto, right?

A growing number of people are saying: "Wrong."

The once noble concept of "charity begins at home" has given way to a board of directors from multi-national corporations, promotional hype, sweepstakes offering a free trip to England, corporate tax deductions and increasing public criticism with countercharges of undermining democracy.

The "United Way" receives opposition

Formerly the United Appeal, the United Way no longer engenders the automatic "King and Country" patriotism of former years.

At the front of the opposition is a small but well-researched group of social welfare workers called the Citizens Concerned About Social Policy (CCASP) who are quick to provide reams of data about the corporate interlocks and misleading promotional material the United Way is plugging into every medium it can use.

• A sampler from CCASP:

Virtually none of the money raised goes to the pockets of the needy. Rather 65 per cent goes to salaries of professionals "serving" the needy and the other 35 per cent covers assorted overhead costs which the United Way doesn't break down (this year's goal for Toronto, for example, is $14.8 million);

• Metro Toronto's 1973 chairman is C. William Daniel, a vice president of Shell Canada, a company which paid no taxes in 1972 and had a net income of more than 778 million;

• Another board member is Philip Connell, vice president in charge of finance for George Weston Ltd. owner of 1,850 supermarkets including Powers and Loblaw's (CCASP wonders what kind of charity there is in today's food prices).

CCASP is not the first to openly question The United Way/Appeal. More than 12 years ago Pierre Berton wrote in a column:

"It is so big, so diverse and so complicated that it no longer has a true image. It is as cold and as impersonal as General Motors. In many people's minds it has ceased to be charity and has become a sort of voluntary tax, squeezed grudgingly from the employees' pay envelopes with the bribe of income tax exemption to sweeten the arm twist from the boss."

Governmental opposition, or at least neutrality, to the appeal has begun to rumble locally.

At the urging of CCASP, the Toronto Board of Education voted not to endorse United Way this year but rather encourage discussion on the merits of the appeal with anti-appeal literature to be allowed to be distributed in schools with the appeal's literature.

Just how far an individual school principal might co-operate is an open point.

Toronto alderman Anne Johnston, also chairwoman of Metro Social Services Committee, wants to see various levels of government take over some functions now provided by United Way organizations and will be taking the proposal to her committee for approval next month.

CCASP criticism

Bob McArthur, CCASP spokesman, points to the two main criticisms his group has against the annual drive.

First, it really isn't all that charitable because most of the corporate services provided to raise the money are tax deductions for the companies which already have a wealth of tax loopholes.

Second, the agencies themselves only treat the victims of social ills — they do not address themselves to the causes of social problems which create the victims. In fact, he says, the appeal's board of directors represents firms which create social problems in some cases.

On top of that, he charges that the advertising used by the appeal is "moral deception." He says one example of this is the picture of a smiling department store executive on page one of a local paper giving his firm's cheque to the United Way.

McArthur says what that doesn't show is that the same department store does not hesitate to lay a criminal charge of shoplifting on the poor person who cannot afford to make a purchase of necessary clothing and steals it instead.

McArthur is also critical of the advertising slogans used. The 1972 slogan was: "Answer the need." Yet of the $13.2 million raised in Toronto only $4.59 million of it came from corporations, some of who pay no taxes on their incomes. The remainder came from tax-paying wage earners, whose tax rate is 20 to 35 per cent.

Corporate participation in the fund raises some of the sharpest questions from CCASP. It is quick to provide an excerpt from an April, 1973, speech made by Tom Eberlee, Ontario deputy minister of community and social services: "It would be utopian to expect Canadian businessmen to abandon their pursuit of profits and begin leading crusades."

"I question how far a corporation is prepared to extend its corporate citizenry when such efforts affect profits."

"How interested are corporations in critical social needs which have 'low visibility'?"

McArthur answers that question by explaining that corporations use the fund raising to enhance their corporate image at the expense of their employees' disproportionately large contributions.

CCASP charges in its printed brochure that the United Way "actually perpetuates the type of social problems it claims to alleviate." The fund does this by cutting off or cutting back money from groups involved in "political" issues and only supporting non-political services.

appeal is not reflected in the appeal's records, but is passed on to the company's consumers while the company gets a tax write-off for its efforts.

Business steps in - the United Way

CCASP points to the 1970 appeal where 70 top business executives were "loaned" by their companies to work on the appeal. Their salaries for that period of time were in excess of $200,000 but were paid by the companies. McArthur says the consumer ultimately has to pay for those salaries because the appeal does not.

Consumers' Gas loaned its radio dispatched cars to the appeal (with no cost to the appeal) and McArthur says people ought to think about that next time they pay their gas bill.

Another sore spot is who does the contributing. Corporations, which are in far better financial position to contribute than wage-earners, only constitute about a third of the total contribution.

CCASP asks why people earning only average or below average wages should be asked to give when companies making millions give a far less percentage out of their income.

In Metro Toronto, CCASP says the average family wage is about $7,200 a year. It says: "If charity consists of those with excess giving to those in need, what should be expected of wage earners who are basically just providing for themselves or even having to manage independently to live on a meagre income?"

But the incentive to give is large. Bell Canada is mailing out United Way sweepstakes tickets in all its telephone bills, the extra cost of the mailing to be paid by Bell subscribers, McArthur said.

For the phone user the incentive to give will be urged on by the prize list, all donated by the companies with the cost passed on to their regular customers:

A free all-expense paid one-week vacation in England, courtesy of Air Canada worth $654 (and their passengers who pay); a picnic hamper full of Jordan wine, courtesy of Jordan wine and its paying customers; a carton of scotch; a free one-year passbook for two at Odeon theatres, worth $300 to paying customers; a number of free meals for two at "leading restaurants"; and the usual collection of small stuff like bicycles and tennis rackets.

While taking a chance on a free week in England may be designed to help soothe guilt feelings about the needy, CCASP explains that some of the corporations behind the appeal are creating more grief than the appeal soothes in guilt complexes.

Four leading food manufacturing and retailing firms have members on the United Way board of directors. McArthur points to the spiralling cost of food as more grief to the unfortunate—a problem the United Way never solves.

The track record of some of those firms is far from enviable. General Foods Canada, a wholly owned US subsidiary, has its president, Robert Hurlbut, on the appeal's board in Toronto.

General Foods buys its coffee beans from Portuguese Angola where black workers work in brutal conditions and the Portuguese government has been reported using vast amounts of repression in attempting to put down the black liberation movement. It is unlikely Toronto's United Way will do much to help that situation.

Governing Council member linked to UW

Imperial Oil of Canada, whose president J.A. Armstrong is on the United Way board, has a subsidiary called Gilbarco Canada Ltd. which McArthur explains once hired the strike-breaking firm of Canadian Drivers' Pool during a labor dispute. Governing Council member W.O. Twaits is the chairman and chief executive officer of Imperial Oil.

Both Imperial Oil and Shell Canada have their executives on the board, but nowhere in the United Way promotion is there any indication that the money that workers contribute to the appeal will have any effect on the soaring costs of home heat or petroleum fuel in general.

While CCASP has been criticising the United Way, the fund-raising group has struck back with two criticisms of CCASP—that the citizens groups should not be criticising during the campaign and that it somehow undermines democracy.

CCASP does not deny it is working to educate people during the United Way appeal, but it didn't start that way. CCASP tried to debate with United Way over six months ago, but the appeal has steadily refused to appear on the same platform with CCASP.

The latest offer to have a public debate was made by CCASP in June for an October 10 Town Hall meeting. United Way officials have claimed they are "too busy" to debate at that time in the middle of their campaign.

The appeal's refusal to publicly debate the issues was the key factor in the Toronto Board of Education's refusal to give a blanket endorsement of the appeal.

That same refusal is also the reply CCASP gives to the fund's undemocratic charge levied by fund chairman and Shell Oil president William Daniel.

McArthur says if the fund refuses to debate in a public meeting, it is the fund which is undemocratic and not CCASP.

Meanwhile CCASP is urging what almost might be called a counter fund raising drive, urging concerned people who do wish to contribute to give to non-United Way organizations:

Says the CCASP brochure:

"The United Way is an antiquated and ineffective method of raising money to solve social and economic problems.

"It is no longer worthy of public confidence or further financial support. The United Way allows corporations to appear like 'good corporate citizens' at the cost of wage earning contributors".

Evans likes the United Way

Although president John Evans has apparently decided to lie low this year and not publicly petition university support for the United Appeal (as he did last fall), it's important to note that the university also attempts to co-operate, like any other big business, with the United Appeal campaign.

Here are some of Evans' comments from last year's fund raising drive. Since the United Appeal hasn't changed its organization, or method of appeal over the last year — except to make it more commercial — Evans' would probably have a similar opinion (although he wasn't available for comment yesterday.)

In appealing to university support staff last fall Evans said: "We who work in the university are in the informed and privileged group that should carry its full responsibility in caring for the less fortunate. Regular payroll deductions of even a small amount per pay can produce a helpful annual total and it is our hope that the majority of the members of our faculty and staff will join in this one United effort to help the needy in our community."

Evans also tried to get the United Appeal legitimized by the university community as the one and only fund to give to: "Some are reported to be considering launching their own separate appeals. This would be unfortunate. Despite the objections some people have to particular agencies in the United Appeal, it is a much more effective way of collecting funds than a whole series of separate campaigns.

But the Toronto Citizen this week listed several organizations in this city which serve as more constructive alternatives.

They include:

- the Grange Park Residents' Association or any other residents' association in a neighbourhood currently fighting important local battles and incurring costs;
- Parkdale Single Parents' Association, 1267 Queen Street West;
- any co-op day care centre;
- Women's Place;
- Pensioners Concerned;
- the Federation of Ontario Housing Residents' Associations or any other active tenants' rights group.

Females invade UTS for first time since 1910

By TINA SREBOTNJAK

For the past 63 years, the University of Toronto Schools at Bloor and Spadina has been the exclusive preserve of men and boys, but this September, 70 female students have been admitted, and three female staff members have been hired.

The change follows a U of T Governing Council decision last February, and the appointment in the summer of 1972 of a new principal, H. Donald Gutteridge, who was particularly interested in seeing the school become co-educational.

Although an integral part of the Faculty of Education at U of T, UTS is little known to most university students. With its limited enrolment (424 this year), its British private boy's school system of "houses" and prefects, and its Old Boy's circuit, UTS has always had the air of privilege and exclusiveness.

The 1908 U of T Board of Governors originally conceived the idea of establishing an elementary and secondary school within the university complex, and planned to build two schools, one for males and one for females. Whether both schools were meant to share the same building, or whether they were to be distinct units is not known. It is more than probable that a co-educational institution was never considered.

In 1910, what was to have been the boys' section accepted its first students. Because of insufficient funds, the girls' school was never built, and UTS remained a totally male institution.

The basis for admission is academic. All students entering the school (at the grade 7 level) must sit for a three hour general knowledge examination, in which they are tested in mathematics, reading comprehension, and vocabulary command. Of the 145 girls who took this exam, 70 scored high enough to be granted admission. The girls are all in grades 7 or 8, the plan being that they progress through the higher levels together. By 1978, UTS will have its first co-ed graduating class.

How do the male students at UTS feel about the abrupt intrusion of females? Alan Rachlin, a grade 7 student who had previously attended an all-male school, says he doesn't mind. He estimates that half his home room class is female, and he feels quite at ease with the girls.

Terry Davison, a fourth year student (grade 12) states that although he's not directly affected by the change (there are no girls past the level of grade 8 level) he fears that the level of academic achievement may drop.

For most students, the affect of the change is minimal, and life at UTS continues much as it has for years.

The move towards integration came so suddenly that proper facilities have not yet been prepared for the school's female students. Washrooms, a locker and shower room are now under construction, and the girls are presently using the facilities of the Faculty of Education, whose building UTS shares.

Gillian Sloan, a grade seven student, enjoys UTS. She feels the boys are somewhat inhibited in the presence of the opposite sex, and that they act "differently, nicer, you know" when in female company. When the novelty of seeing skirts in the hallways wears off, that deference will most probably fade quickly into indifference.

Hart House fund drive advised

By PAUL McGRATH

A task group report on campus services prepared this summer recommended to the Internal Affairs Committee that Hart House rearrange its priorities and take a look at a possible fund-raising drive before any attempt is made to raise the Hart House fee.

The committee, chaired by former Governing Council member Ian Morrison, was asked to look into administrative services on the campus, which include Hart House, the U of T bookstore, and residence and non-residence food services.

The task group felt that Hart House could better use its existing money to make room for new programs. The report recommended completion of the work being done on the Hart House Survey, where workers sometimes are forced to endure temperatures of 120 degrees.

SAC Services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch took exception to the group's report in a letter to Morrison early in the summer, calling many of the Hart House expenditures "frills."

Kanowitch was dissatisfied with the whole report, saying the report was too hastily prepared.

"While the SAC recognizes that a major evaluation of university services is urgently needed, it is our feeling that a shoddy evaluation is as of little value as no evaluation at all, and in fact can be considerably more dangerous," he said in the letter.

The task group dealt with the subject of non-residence food.

They felt that there was a certain amount of dissatisfaction on the campus with regards to quality of the food being served.

By quality, the group added, they did not mean to imply that the university was using second-rate foodstuffs, but that it referred to "what may be termed as the 'institutional' aspects of a large-scale food service - the food is often dull and tastes 'mass-produced'."

The report suggested a decentralization process of food concessions and asked that any possible small space be tendered out to any individual who might offer a small variety of food.

On the topic of the bookstore, the group asked the administration to consider severing the relationship between the store and the University of Toronto Press. They also recommended that an inquiry be made into the policy of price mark-up in the store, to see if it is "consistent with the aim of providing books at the cheapest possible price."

Kanowitch countered that this investigation would be a waste of time.

"It is our opinion that it is quite clear that the present mark-up policy is quite inconsistent with the aim of providing books at the cheapest possible prices, and should be revised."

City wants to prevent demolition

Odeon-Carlton's fate may be decided tomorrow

By CHRIS PROBERT

The fate of the Odeon-Carlton theatre at Carlton and Yonge may be settled by the courts this Thursday. At that time, the City will be required to show cause why it should not grant a demolition permit to Kuhl Construction, owner of the building. Several groups, notably the Canadian Opera Company and the National Ballet School, have expressed an interest in the theatre, in view of its acoustics, which are excellent.

The Odeon-Carlton is one of a rare breed of theatre, the "cathedral theatre." It was also the only theatre in Toronto to feature live organ music before the shows on Friday and Saturday nights. The Theatre Organ Society is interested in acquiring the Odeon-Carlton organ, which regularly rose from a trap door to the level of the stage (the screen is recessed) with organist Colin Corbett at the keyboard.

Last Wednesday, Toronto City Council officially designated the building a historic site. Kuhl

Construction had already applied for a demolition permit, approximately a week before. The effect of council's decision was to stay the demolition for 60 days, while it seeks an alternative to the construction company's plan, which is to build an apartment-hotel with a north tower about 30 stories high, and a south tower of 23 stories, on the site. Kuhl at present has the building permit for the apartment-hotel. The company is currently constructing a second, similar, apartment hotel next door to the Odeon-Carlton.

Kuhl Construction has since brought an action of mandamus against the City, in an attempt to force the city to grant a demolition permit. If it is successful on Thursday, demolition can begin on Friday.

The Odeon-Carlton has largely been stripped of its furnishings in the past week by the former owners, the Odeon chain, who have a month before the new owner takes possession. There has been fear that the hasty removal of furnishings will damage the building.

Monday morning, a meeting was held to decide the fate of the building. Those present included Alderman Art Eggleton, Marilyn Carley, a representative from the Mayor's office, a lawyer and an architect for Kuhl, Dr. Boyd Neel, former dean of U of T's Faculty of Music, and Dr. Herman Geiger-Torel, of the Canadian Opera Company. The meeting was inconclusive, because Kuhl was unable to enter into the discussion, in view of the ongoing legal action in which he is involved.

Dr. Geiger-Torel said that he was "pessimistic" about acquiring the theatre for the opera company. Even if this proved feasible, he said, it would be necessary for his purposes to have the building enlarged.

Interestingly, opera has been seen at the Odeon-Carlton before. Dr. Geiger-Torel recalled a company which rented the theatre in the early 50's to put on "some bad operas", one of which moved him sufficiently to write a parody.

The North Jarvis Community Association is opposing the development because of what it feels it will do to the neighbourhood. The NJCA initially became involved in the controversy over the other apartment-hotel.

This other building is being erected on a lot which had remained vacant and something of an eyesore for over 15 years, surrounded by an eight foot board fence. During this period of time seedlings had grown into trees thirty feet high. The North Jarvis Association had hoped that the land could be used for parkland, as there is no park in the area, and was particularly unhappy that, instead, it should be zoned for a high-density development, over twice the density of St. James Town. Kuhl's overall plan for the two apartment-hotels envisions 2,000 people living on a site of under two acres. The maximum density permissible by Metro by-law in a residential area is 4.375, that is, 4,375 floor space times the area of the lot. For the Kuhl development, zoned as "commercial", the density is 12.

The North Jarvis Association is concerned with other aspects of the development as well. Before building on the vacant lot could commence, an old, "aborted", partial foundation which had been halted by the presence on an underground stream, was "pounded into dust", causing complaints about the noise.

A second concern is that according to the present plan, there will be almost no space between the two buildings, and very little between the one now under construction and Maple Leaf Gardens.

Sad saga at Brock

ST. CATHERINES, ONT. CUP—In an effort to fight what they see as unjustified price increases, Brock University students are boycotting Saga Food Services and patronizing their own student co-op.

The Co-op's only aim, however, is to hurt Saga business in the cafeteria, hoping to pressure the company into recognizing the students' demands and to bargain in good faith in the future.

Jack MacDonald, Saga Food Services director on campus, claims that the increase is only 9.2 percent and is reasonable. However this is an aggregate figure and a number of the increases affecting popular items such as milk have been considerably higher, ranging up to 37 percent.

In addition, there are rumours that Saga would cut out unlimited second helpings in a residence cafeteria, part of its original agreement. It has already cut out the promised Saturday night steak dinners, claiming they were too expensive.

Money in the bank: Fairview sale approved

It is in the best interest of the community at large to sell the U of T owned property at 188 Yonge Street to Fairview Corporation, the Governing Council's External Affairs Committee decided on Monday.

The committee was considering the public relations aspects of the property sale especially in the wake of press articles that committee members called inaccurate.

Leonard Bertin of the U of T News Bureau suggested that it would be "most useful to prepare a contingency paper" that would set out the university's position, when the sale was officially completed. The committee were anticipating opposition from various groups, and individuals especially those who thought the U of T had broken the conditions under which it was bequeathed the property.

The U of T has been negotiating with Fairview Corp, the company which is building the Eaton Centre complex and shopping mall in the downtown block bounded by Queen, Yonge, Dundas and Bay streets.

The property was left to the U of T in 1922 by one Naomi Bilton whose father used to sell oysters on Queen Street before Timothy Eaton moved in and started buying up property. A bitter feud between the families possibly started over the fish smell emanating from the Bilton Store led to a stipulation in Naomi Bilton's will, that the property was never to be sold or leased to members of the Eaton family or company, nor was it to be used by a person or corporation carrying on the business of a departmental store.

Vice president of business affairs, Alex Rankin, said that the university has not tried "to break the will" and has "always had the right to sell the property." In selling the land to Fairview, the university will not be selling to the Eatons and the property will not be used for a department store, but for a downtown suburban-type shopping mall which will house smaller stores.

Although the committee was not to consider whether the sale was a good one or not, a memorandum was circulated pointing out that the university had received a yearly net income from the property of $10,500 over the past five years, and the price offered by Fairview is "in excess of what our (the university's) really appraisers have estimated to be a fair market price."

Rankin also pointed out that the property which has a 24-foot frontage on Yonge Street and is 82.5 feet long, is not large enough to hold a commercial building with two stairs, elevators, and other amenities, and was surrounded on all sides by Eaton's. "When it comes down to it," Rankin said, "the university is well out of it from an investment standpoint."

There is "no sentimental attachment to a business property", Rankin said, and the university has a chance to realize a profit and reinvest the money.

Although the External Affairs Committee looks after relations with the "giving community" — those people who give money to the university, — committee member Witti Boadhurst said the university had a "greater moral obligation to the community than to Mrs. Bilton." Although in selling the property, the university is not legally breaking the will, it is perhaps going against the spirit of the will by selling to a company acting as Eaton's developer, and with whom Eaton's is a party in the city's development agreements.

The committee did not discuss the merits of the Eaton Centre scheme, but merely pointed out that it had been approved by the City Council. No mention was made that it was last year's city council that gave the go-ahead — a council which had a penchant for big-scale developments, some of which have since been blocked.

Rankin commented that the Fairview development would go forward "with or without the sale." President John Evans also commented that the university would have to rehabilitate the building if it were retained.

The fact that the building has been declared architecturally significant by the Toronto Historical Board is not a concern of the university, but will be a problem for the new owners, Rankin said. The 60-day grace period the city can exercise on issuing demolition permits on historic buildings approved by City Council, would give the city an opportunity to petition for its preservation, Evans commented.

The city in fact has no power to stop destruction of a building after the 60 day period, and can only exercise moral persuasion on the owner. External Affairs, having dealt with the public relations issues, and the trust aspects—both conveyed by the Bilton will, and the historic trust in regard to the building—are forwarding the matter to Business Affairs and the Governing Council.

East-end kids may be tested for lead in blood

By DICK BROWN

With a government report indicating lead levels 68 times higher than normal in the soil adjacent to the Canada Metal Co. Ltd. plant in Toronto's east end, area residents are awaiting an October 23 Metro Board of Health meeting to see if their children will be tested for possible unsafe lead levels in their bodies.

A reading of 8,250 parts per million in the soil just 200 feet from the Eastern Avenue plant was published in a December 1972 report of the Air Management Branch of the provincial Ministry of Environment. That report said its control reading, or normal, was 120 parts per million in the soil.

Another reading 1,000 feet from the Riverdale plant was 4,880 parts per million in the soil, according to the report.

Dallard Runge, a spokesman for the Greater Riverdale Organization and residents on Berkshire, Rushbrooke, Eastern, Marigold and Mosely Streets, said area residents want tests done on children attending two neighborhood elementary schools, St. Joseph's Separate School and Bruce Street Public School.

The Bruce Street school is 600 feet from the Canada Metals plant which recycles lead from various sources. The government report indicated the plant puts 9.5 pounds of lead per hour into the air and 180 pounds of sulphur dioxide per hour into the air.

While the government appears to be taking some action, residents are convinced it is not enough, Runge said.

The air management branch is demanding Canada metals meet industrial standards of emissions, but residents say they should not be forced to live under the lead dust of industrial standards 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. Rather, they say, there should be stricter residential standards imposed, but no one seems to know what they should be.

The December government report isn't much help either. While the lead content in the soil is measured in parts per million, the air management industrial standards are measured in micrograms per cubic metres, Runge said. That's like comparing apples and oranges to figure out how many potatoes one has; it doesn't make much sense.

That's why residents want standards set and Canada Metals made to comply, Runge said. It's also part of the reason residents want their children tested for that seems to be the only sure way to know whether damage has been done or not.

A person exposed to lead never expels the metal, but instead retains it in his body. Large quantities of lead in the body can lead to serious physical damage to certain parts of the nervous system and even brain damage.

Runge said there was general satisfaction with last week's meeting between area residents and Airman Paul Pickett, chairman of the Metro Board of Health.

He said Pickett basically gave residents a runaround when probed about whether there would be done on the children. The teachers who would be doing the tests are to meet on October 11, Runge said, to discuss the proposed tests.

Get your lawyers ready

Toronto residents will have the chance to lambast or support the city's proposed 45 foot height limitations in the city core at a meeting tomorrow night at 8 pm in the City Hall Council Chambers.

Council's final decision on the height limitation is dependent on a public meeting being held.

Developers and developers' lawyers have been sending in letters to City Council, expressing their alarm at this clamp-down by council that would require developers to bargain with the city and community groups. But nothing yet has been heard from the citizenry.

After council passes the bylaw, it goes on to the Ontario Municipal Board, where an even greater power of developers will defend the right of the property industry to build as high as zoning laws allow.

The committee that's been set up "a waste of time" by some developers—the U of T-City Liaison Committee—meets to-day at City Committee Room 1 at 2 pm.

A deputation from Victoria College will try to prod the committee into considering a traffic light, walk, or something else across west side of Queen's Park Crescent at Hart House, where thousands of students daily challenge the automobile in their efforts to get to class. All others who have risked their lives are invited to lend their support.

Scar security beefed up after weekend attack

Scarborough College administration has suddenly improved the security forces assigned to patrol college grounds in the evening, but the intensified patrols came too late to prevent a woman from being molested in a dimly lit college parking lot last week.

The incident, which was hushed up by the administration, prompted a sudden expansion of the college's night-time security operations but students and teaching staff continue to complain about the lack of supervision in several of the parking areas.

Under revised parking arrangements approved late in the spring, a $40 fee was imposed for parking spaces close to the college buildings but three large unsupervised lots were made available for free parking about five minutes' walk away. The woman was attacked in one of these dark lots which are patrolled cursorily only about once per hour despite being filled almost continually with the cars of students who cannot afford the $40 or 35¢ per day fees charged for the other lots.

Even after the security patrols were improved, many female teachers and night students still refuse to walk to the free parking lots after dark unless accompanied by a security officer, says student council president Ross Flowers.

Flowers, who is also chairman of a student-faculty-administration committee overseeing the operations of Scarborough's newly opened student residence complex, had asked for improved security procedures following the murder of an Erindale College student last month.

"Many female students in the residences simply refused to go out after dark when they read about that tragic event at Erindale", Flower said. "Student Council impressed on the administration that such a crime could easily happen at Scarborough unless strong security measures were taken immediately".

At the time the student protests were made, the administration had reportedly decided not to replace a security guard who had recently suffered a heart attack. This would have left only one guard to patrol the entire Scarborough buildings and grounds in the evenings, but additional guards have since been assigned to night patrols.

However, all is not quiet in residence land since many students still lack curtains for their bedroom windows, and in some places there are no telephones.

Last weekend, the administration attempted to impose a midnight curfew on the numerous noisy parties that have rapidly become a feature of residence life. Students opposed the arbitrary time limit which had been ordered without any student consultation.

A crisis seemed to be rapidly brewing but somehow the all-night parties of a few days earlier suddenly wrapped up at midnight and the curfew issue as of now remains unresolved.

If you go out in the woods today, prepare for a big surprise...

Ontario housing report stresses 'co-operation'

By TIM GALLAGHER

Co-operation is the key word in the Ontario government's latest task force report on housing.

Besides assistance from federal and municipal levels of government, the report states that the Ontario government will need "the co-operation of land developers and building companies." In stimulating the housing industry, the Comay Task Force on Housing recommends that government "assist housing production rather than raise standards." To impose building standards, it felt, would result in housing uniformity and inhibit housing needs.

The government's prime role will be to establish guidelines for future housing development. To institute government leadership and initiative in this area of concern, a ministry of housing is strongly recommended. Such a ministry would take over and expand on the functions now performed by the Ontario Housing Corporation. A statement issued by Premier William Davis on September 13, acknowledged that the Conservative government will act upon this recommendation and others during the fall session of the legislature.

Although Davis' printed statement admits "serious housing problems", it claims that Ontario's housing industry is the most efficient in Canada. However, he has reassured the public that housing will be a high priority on the government's agenda.

The Comay report estimates that the province will need over one million new housing units during the next ten years. New measures to cope with the cost and supply of such future housing will require government aid in "restoring the effectiveness of the private market." In addition, a reexamination of expropriation laws is expected. The report feels that renewed efforts are required "to speed the processing of development applications" so that the government will be able to handle the housing requirements for 1974-75.

According to the report, increased housing demand is "chiefly the result of rising expectations combined with larger incomes." This demand and high interest rates have produced an "unacceptable rate of increase in the cost of housing."

In order to meet the supply requirement, government is taking action to provide housing for a wide range of income groups. Purchase of public lands under a land banking scheme will assist co-operative and non-profit companies in erecting low-cost housing units. Unfortunately, the government plans to buy only "several years' supply of land" in its effort to stabilize prices.

The report goes on to state that "no a priori policy should be established" concerning the fate of public lands. It is suggested these lands could ultimately be sold to developers. The proposed Ontario

Housing Finance Corporation would handle the land purchase fund.

Financial assistance for families making as little as $12,000 is scheduled for approval. Rent control is not a part of provincial housing policy but is a "matter of priority the government should examine."

The report submits that "quality control over the building industry in Canada is almost non-existent." Space in the report is devoted to discussion of a possible housing warranty. Units would be built with the company responsible for the cost of repairing construction defects.

A landlord-tenant tribunal or court is mentioned as a means of dealing with conflicts over such things as eviction notices.

Provision has been made to require landlords to outline a list of tenant rights and responsibilities in every residential lease. In effect, if implemented, a contract of sorts would be created binding both the tenant and the landlord to certain legal requirements. In multi-lingual areas translations of the lease would be a necessity.

Mention is also given to "special groups" including students and native people.

Students it is assumed, have adequate housing. They will be accommodated in off-campus units. Consideration for additional housing will depend upon enrolment figures and the local housing situation. According to the report, students are expected to share rooms.

No problem with student housing, because they can share rooms, says Comay task force.

The report makes vague references to native people. For instance, the report states "claims concerning discrimination against Indian applicants for public housing should be examined; and if it is found that discrimination does occur, it should be corrected."

The Ontario NDP charged in a statement that the Comay report did not delve into low-cost housing. Nothing was mentioned about the profiteering of landlords and more importantly land developers. Furthermore, the NDP felt there was too much stress on private industry. The government wasn't buying enough land to meet long-range goals. An attack was also made on the media for their "uncritical approval to every grandiose government promise about housing over the past ten years."

On the whole, the report makes few concrete suggestions. As the NDP pointed out most of the report could have been taken from any number of sources already written. The quality of housing lacks any real mention. No references are made to the paper-thin walls of many apartments from which you can hear a pin drop down the next hall.

It would appear that the developers will be the only ones who benefit from the Comay Report. The report finishes by stating that "planning, developing, and managing of housing" should be delegated to Metro Toronto and to municipalities willing and able to take the responsibility. In this way the province can pass the problem to another level of government which is susceptible to control by development interests.

Interfac rugby starts, UC wins in football

Rugby by Neil Sorbie

The first interfac rugby match took place on Monday between PHE I and Eng I. Both teams started out sluggishly and play was confined mainly to the centre field area.

After the first few minutes the plumbers' play improved considerably and fine running and backing up led to Richard McCloud scoring a try for them just beside the up-rights.

PHE's scrappy play resulted in their bunching and lack of real backline to move the ball. However, quick thinking produced a score when Larry Cooling took a fast penalty kick and passed to Bruce Kennedy who broke two tackles and went over for the tie. The conversion was missed and the game ended in a 4-4 tie.

Football by Dave Stuart

Second division action got underway Monday when UC Redmen romped over Forestry 38-6.

Solid running by Pandey, Goldenberg, Young and Rose together with the efficient pass catching of McGillivray simply overpowered the Forestry defence. The axemen contributed to their own downfall by giving up three interceptions and a fumble in their own end.

Almost the entire first quarter was taken up with a sustained drive by UC, ending in a four-yard dive by Young for the TD.

UC struck early in the second quarter after a Forestry fumble when Goldenberg scored untouched on a counter play. A Rose pass to McGillivray was good for the two-point conversion.

The game continued in much the same vein with majors from Rose and Pandey, and two from McGillivray, all unconverted. The real highlight occurred when three UC players decided to exercise their knuckles on an unidentified Forestry player while the officials were asleep.

Forestry quarterback Clark hit Eggleton on the first play of the fourth quarter for a 45 yard gain. That drive stalled, but Forestry returned with two seconds left on another pass to Eggleton to crack the scoreboard, for the final score of 38-6.

The outstanding player of the game was UC's McGillivray, who caught nine passes for 100 yards and 14 points. UC is a strong contender this year, but injuries could be a factor since they dressed only 15 players.

Soccer by Jock Raunt

In first division Arts Cup play Erindale squeaked by Scarborough 2-1 on goals by Li and So, with Emmet replying for the losers. St. Mikes A had little difficulty in shutting out UC 3-0 on markers by Buirin, Bartolini, and Liscio.

Vic and Scarborough played to the ultimate in soccer frustration, a scoreless tie. Engineering versus Erindale was postponed. Early results point to a two-way race between Erindale and St. Mikes.

In the second division PHE employed various rejects from Blues hockey, rugby and 43 man squamish to humble St. Mikes B 7-0. Pastorek scored a hat-trick while singles went to Nikolov, Fifield, Sorbie and Hrkal. In their next game the jocks cleaned New 6-1 with pairs from Taylor and Nikolov, and singles from Hrkal and Curtis. McDonald was the lone scorer for the gnus.

Trinity A had only a slight edge on the play against the Lawmen, but opportunistic strikers and some good luck turned it into a 4-0 win on a pair by Rosy, and singles from 'Rock' Hally and Studley. At this point it looks as if PHE is the team to beat, with Jr. Eng. and possibly Trin A having the best shot at them.

In the third division the Grads, far removed from their once-great stature in the first division, are easily the strongest team around. They opened with a 2-0 win over Knox on goals by Brown and Stewart, and continued with the same score over Emmanuel on a pair by Duker.

Eng III is probably the biggest threat to them, after winning a clean, fast opener against Trin B 3-1 with two from Wright and one from Yee. Ma countered for the losers with a penalty goal. Innis got goals from Winston and Caplan against scores by Duncanson and Sarafyn for the treecutters in a 2-2 saw-off.

Field hockey team opens new season looking for 12th

By DAINA ZUKAUSKAS and LESLIE MCINTOSH

At eight o'clock every Monday, Wednesday and Friday morning from now until November, twenty-eight dedicated women athletes will tie on their cleats and baffle the groundskeepers at Varsity stadium with an assortment of rare skills involving the use of a hooked stick and hard leather ball. It is this agonizing early morning ritual that has helped U of T's senior and intermediate field hockey teams to establish their long-standing record of wins (11 in a row) in the Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association. Seniors won Ontario's for past 11 years.

Another contributing factor to the success of the field hockey Blues over the years has been their participation in the Ontario Women's Field Hockey Association league competition Saturday mornings. The Toronto-Hamilton based league offers the challenge of national level players and well-established and seasoned teams. This year the league has adopted a new vertical structure with Junior, A and B levels for the purpose of providing an opportunity for younger players to gain experience. The league is at present involved in reshuffling the teams, but this system will eventually provide an effective organization under which a player will remain affiliated with the same club throughout every level of competition. For the first time, U of T has entered teams at both the A and B levels. Fairly strong contenders, Toronto's teams will have to drop out of city-league play after Thanksgiving to enter intercollegiate competition. In the past it has been the city-league teams alone who have handed U of T their rare defeats.

The senior team, under the guidance of Nancy Gossling, has a mixture of "veterans" (Sue Scott, Jennifer Dakin, Pat Williams, Barb Richardson, and Dyanah 'Prentice), intermediates who have moved up to senior from last year and a number of rookies. Chris Crawford and Daina Zukauskas are new to the senior team from the intermediate team of last year while rookies Debbie Wilson, Leslie McIntosh, Sally Dakin, Ann Halpern and Pam Dunbar make this the most inexperienced team Toronto has fielded for many years. Also new to the team are goalie Ann Milburn and manager Liz Wilson.

Liz Hoffman directs the intermediate team, whose line-up includes only five returning players. The experience of Eleanor Howey, Nancy Thomson, Betty Shostak, Jill Bennett and Vicki Porter is complemented by the rookie exuberance of Trish Beck, Penny Redmann, Wendy Grater, Terry Knight, May Grenier, Chris Doda and Ann Hoffman.

OWIAA tournaments are scheduled on four weekends in a row: a compulsory early bird tournament at York on October 12 and 13; the Waterloo Invitational tournament October 19 and 20; Part I of OWIAA league play at McMaster October 26 and 27; Part II of Ontario University league play at Guelph November 2 and 3.

The U of T golf team first four have been selected, with competition still open for the fifth place. The squad of Doug Findlay, John Bayes, Jim Atkinson, and Tony Sergautis placed second in the Waterloo invitational tournament. John Bayes was low medalist.

In the Trent invitational tourney the same team again placed second, this time with Jim Atkinson gaining low medalist. They go to the Catarauqui course in Kingston this Friday for thirty-six holes in the eastern semi-finals. The top four qualifiers then go into the finals in London the next weekend. Judging from performance so far this year, U of T should make it at least as far as London...

Rugby seems to be catching on these days as a campus sport. Several colleges expect to field 15-a-side teams for exhibition play this fall. Trinity lost 14-0 on Monday against a motley collection of Blues seconds in a game that showed up both their enthusiasm and lack of skill. It is to be hoped that future years will see a regular 15-a-side interfaculty league.

Print shop at SAC may go

By BOB BETTSON

The Students' Administrative Council and the Governing Council are headed for a collision over the operation of a non-profit printing and publishing firm in the basement of the SAC building at 12 Hart House Circle.

The Governing Council's Business Affairs Committee decided in a matter of minutes Wednesday to tell SAC that it could not sublet or allocate space for any outside printing firm.

Ontario Alternate Distribution is still operating and SAC president Bob Anderson says that "the print shop is going to stay."

Vice president of Business Affairs Alex Rankin said last night that the firm is there "illegally" and it will be up to Internal Affairs Committee to take any further action.

SAC decided unanimously Wednesday night to continue the operation, maintaining that the activities carried on in the SAC building are only SAC's concern. They condemned the "duplicity" of vice-president Jill Conway, who, Anderson said, had assured him that discussion of the item would be delayed.

Neither Anderson nor the student members of the committee were present when the item was discussed near the conclusion of the meeting.

The group of businessmen, alumni and professors was unanimous in its decision not to allow the agreement.

Chairman James Joyce said that it was clear that the Governing Council should say that it was not bound by the agreement.

Professor W.B. Coutts said that since the building was owned by the U of T it was obvious that it could not be rented without permission.

Government appointee Bill Harris remarked that he had seen an add in a magazine for printed pamphlets giving the SAC building as the address. He suggested that this be forbidden too.

Harris was referring to Hogtown press, operated by SAC to distribute a number of political and educational articles on a non-profit basis.

Last winter SAC Press, a SAC owned and operated printing firm was scrapped because of large financial losses. To replace the cheap service for campus groups and student organizations, the new council decided in April to rent the basement of the SAC building to Ontario Alternate Distribution, a non-profit corporation.

However the U of T administration was quick to react, refusing to approve the project because it was "too risky" and would threaten the position of the administration-operated U of T Press.

SAC informed the university that the company would not operate on a normal commercial basis and any profits made on printing would be put into publishing otherwise unprofitable materials. SAC pointed out that Ontario Alternate Distribution operation would only be doing work for students, community groups and other non-profit organizations.

Conway responded by advising SAC that the administration had decided against approving the agreement citing a legal opinion by university solicitors Cassells-Brock which said that the operation would contravene zoning laws and would result in the loss of tax-exempt status on the university-owned building.

Cassells-Brock also stated that the agreement would have to be concluded between the firm and the Governing Council because SAC is "not a legal entity."

Anderson challenged that interpretation with SAC's own legal advice in a letter to Conway in late July citing the operation of profit-making athletic facilities, catering services and the U of T Press on campus.

He informed Conway that SAC would go ahead anyway and conclude an agreement, subject to modifications to minimize the risk to the university.

Meanwhile the printing and publishing service, more commonly called Better Read, has been operating a non profit service to students on campus since early July.

The employees are working for subsistence wages with five persons sharing the equivalent of three full-time salaries. SAC has agreed to a number of safeguards which would prevent the print shop from becoming a commercial operation.

Anderson said that the treatment of the firm was inconsistent with the treatment of U of T Press. He maintained that zoning laws were now being loosely interpreted to allow various administration-run enterprises.

He added that "Cassells-Brock was probably asked to look for difficulties in the concluding of the agreement."

Fly the United Way, but strings attached

Would you believe that there's enough hot air in Simcoe Hall to send this balloon to Rangoon? (and that's a return ticket). While this was airborne to promote the 1973 United Way campaign, SAC was deciding to give $160 to help distribute anti-UW material to Metro schools.

Flowers fades at Scarborough

John O'Donohue led Scarborough Wednesday with 229 positive votes to 31 rejections as only 14 per cent of the college student population voted in the widely-publicized non-election.

Scarborough Student Council president Ross Flowers received 139 affirmative votes and 31 rejections, while Scott Cavalier's figures were 132 affirmative to 50 negative. The other two contenders, Vivian Rossman and Sreela Sengupta received 105-58, and 107-54 figures respectively.

The acclamations of these five above SAC reps last Spring were technically illegal due to a unique Scarborough constitutional rule requiring all acclamations to be placed on the ballot.

Six acclamations were involved among the nine candidates listed on the ballot and with a genuine race really existing only for two first-year positions, there was virtually no interest shown by students in other years.

Bill Deneault topped the first year poll with 90 votes, followed by William Warburton (63) and the unsuccessful Richard Turnock (35).

Only six part-time students voted in the acclamation of former Scarborough SAC rep Andy Denver as a SCSC vice-president. However, Denver had the pleasure of receiving a 100 per cent mandate as all six voted to affirm his acclamation.

Total turnout was only 305 voters as no less than five of the nine candidates filed returns indicating absolutely no campaign expenses whatsoever.

In spite of the sparse campaigning, discussion of alleged election irregularities occupied a significant portion of the Scarborough council meeting held after the votes were counted Wednesday evening. Several students complained that candidates were soliciting votes right beside the ballot boxes, but it was pointed out that there is no provincial or municipal law prohibiting such conduct.

Council members glowed with magnanimity as they voted to overlook all the alleged violations but approved the creation of a series of stringent election campaign rules for the next round of by-elections set for November 1 to fill five remaining vacancies.

Scarborough-SAC financial relations, always a contentious item for the expanding suburban campus, got another airing as SCSC finance commissioner David Onley demanded an assurance that the $5,300 remaining in the SAC fund for projects at Scarborough would indeed be received this year. O'Donohue countered with a query about the $4,200 SCSC still owes SAC from previous loans.

Finally, it was suggested that a principled compromise could probably be worked out by subtracting the $4,200 from the $5,300, and everybody went away happy having completed another pleasant sojourn in student-council-land.

Vote set for jock reps

Students are being asked to vote in a referendum on October 17 and 18 for a student majority on a combined men's-women's athletic directorate.

Here are a few ways that athletics affects students:

- In 1971-72 students paid for well over 50 per cent of the total operating costs of the men's athletics program, but the university administration didn't pay a penny.
- Two years ago the administration raised the men's athletics fee without any consultation with or explanation to students; it could happen again.

- approximately 300 inter-collegiate students received $100,000 for athletics expenses in 1971-72, while the intramural department with over 4,000 student participants, received less than $12,000.

- four of the seven students on the 20 member directorate represent inter-collegiate sports, two represent intramural sports.

For a further explanation of how the system operates against students, see page four.

U of T mourns Allende

In a message to Innis College principal Peter Russell president John Evans agreed to declare today an official "Day of Mourning" for the late Chilean president, Salvador Allende, and all who have died in the generals' coup. This follows from an initiative by the Students' Administrative Council and the Graduate Students' Union.

Flags will be flown at half-mast today in honor of the Chilean dead. Campus groups formed to protest the coup will hold a "Tribute to Free Chile" in Convocation Hall from 1 to 2 pm. Besides a tribute to be given to Salvador Allende by a Chilean student, there will be Chilean folk music and a reading from the poetry of the late Pablo Neruda.

The groups hope to build up anti-junta forces at U of T in preparation for major efforts planned for the city on October 18, when Michel Chartrand is expected to speak. Also, last weekend's Helsinki conference on Chile called for world-wide demonstrations on November 4.

Student-run grub at Erindale

By DENNIS RAK

Last Tuesday Murphy's, a new student-organized food service opened at Erindale College. The Erindale student council (SAGE) set it up because Canteen of Canada has failed to provide adequate food services to hungry students in the College's two cafeterias.

Murphy's, located in Coleman House - Erindale's mini-version of Hart House - serves super submarine sandwiches over-stuffed with meats, tomato and other goodies.

Murphy's decor offers the old Yorkville coffee house type atmosphere. They've even provided a small stage for the struggling resident folkies.

Many of the Erindale students complained about Canteen's inconsistent food quality, undersized portions and excessively long line-ups at the check-out.

Criticisms of this sort may be levelled at any U of T cafeteria, but students from any other campus can choose to eat on campus or off.

Erindale students have no such option. There are no eating places within walking distance of the campus. Hence, Murphy's provides an alternative to Canteen's monopoly of the food services at Erindale.

The student-organized food-service is a non-profit operation, and prices cover only the cost of the food and help.

There have been several attempts to provide alternative student-run food services in the past. They met with limited student support and no longer exist. But organizers believe that Murphy's could be the first successful service because students are now living on campus for the first time at Erindale.

SAGE has also opened another student-operated store, this one specializing in new jeans for $10 and second-hand books.

SAC accepts Discipline Code, 15-13

By MARINA STRAUSS

Following a session of long, solid debate, Students Administrative Council members Wednesday evening narrowly defeated a motion 15-13 to reject the university's new Discipline Code as illegitimate.

SAC services commissioner Seymour Kanowitch presented the motion at Wednesday's general SAC meeting, arguing that to accept the code would "legitimize laws that we students had no place in designing."

In introducing the motion, Kanowitch was rejecting a proposed SAC interpretation of the code's controversial sections. SAC president Bob Anderson was the key figure in drawing up this interpretation.

However the council came to no decision on approval of the interpretation, and will discuss it further in its next meeting in two weeks.

The interpretation comes after objections to the code's vague wording, which allows "an unacceptable degree of administrative discretion in its application".

SAC did decide to hold a mass meeting before the next Governing Council meeting on October 18 to discuss the Code.

Several SAC members spoke out against the validity of a Code drawn up with no student input.

"The Code was passed in the university's existing structure", charged New College representative Susan Goldberg. "They've manoeuvred the good with the bad."

The university administration "will go on waffling for a couple of years" if SAC accepts the code, even in part. "We must reject the whole thing," she insisted.

The Governing Council approved the Discipline Code last June despite student leaders' requests to delay it until September. Eight students sit on the 50-member Council.

Anderson maintained that SAC's interpretation would restrict the ability to apply vague clauses. He referred to the controversial clause making it an offense to disrupt intentionally, disturb or obstruct "unduly" authorized university activities.

"This is hollow," countered vice-president Mike Scott. "Students will be intimidated by the code and will be put in a passive role. Our hope is to show students what role they should take in the university will be squashed."

Anderson felt that the body to enforce the code, two students, two faculty, and an alumnus, would protect students' rights far more than the presently proposed system.

In other business, SAC approved its response to the Forster Task Force Report on Academic Appointments.

The Forster Report gives students only token representation on hiring, firing, and tenure committees.

In its response, SAC argued that teaching, assessed by student evaluations, rather than research should be the key to assessing a professor's performance. SAC indicates ways in which teaching performance can be evaluated.

In its October 17-18 referendum, SAC will be asking students if they support a student role in staffing decisions.

Susan Goldberg sparked heavy debate by a subsequently defeated suggestion that SAC suppress its controversial "Faculty Funnies", an offshoot of the SAC campaign to inform students of their non-role in staff decisions. The booklet irreverently depicts faculty establishment's dominance in academic appointments.

Goldberg argued that the Funnies would not educate students, but would destroy potential support. She objected that it was "too general and takes in too many professors".

Governing Council member Gord Barnes feared the loss as well of support of junior faculty members already sympathetic to SAC's stance. "They will interpret the SAC position as against all faculty."

But Kanowitch countered: "It's quite clear that the faculty is our enemy."

The few faculty members who supported students in last year's math department firings, said Scott, did so secretly, because it was not in their best interests to put pressure on the authorities.

"The Faculty Funnies is a fair and accurate description of what goes on in this university", he contended.

Anderson, against releasing the Funnies, contended they "confuse people and reduce the credibility of the campaign".

SAC left the decision to redistribute the Funnies to the referendum's steering committee, which is composed of SAC reps and students. Last night the committee decided to distribute the booklet in its campaign.

At Wednesday's meeting, SAC agreed to support the workers at Artistic Woodworkers and the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union in their attempt to win trade union rights.

SAC condemns use of metro police as strike-breakers and will sponsor a union organized meeting on campus to inform students of the situation.

Workers at Artistic have been on strike since August 21 in an attempt to secure basic rights.

SAC unanimously decided not to recognize the legitimacy of the U of T Act Review Committee, and it will urge all Governing Council student members to boycott the committee and its operations.

Two weeks ago the Governing Council approved the setting up of a fifteen-member committee including only three students to review the 1971 Act.

SAC elected three delegates to attend the National Union of Students' convention on October 18. However, this month's referendum has yet to tell whether students will accept U of T's membership in NUS. Delegates chosen were Goldberg, Anderson, and vice-president Steve Moses.

Business Affairs approves 188 Yonge sale

By BOB BETTSON

The sale of U of T owned property at 188 Yonge Street to Fairview Corporation was quickly approved Wednesday by the Business Affairs Committee of the Governing Council.

Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin said the sale was purely a business decision. "We are now getting a poor return on investment. Yearly net income on the property has been $10,500 annually for the last five years."

The U of T has been negotiating the sale of the property to the Fairview corporation for use in the Eaton-Fairview development despite a provision in the 1922 will of Naomi Bilton which left the property to the university on condition that it not be leased or sold to members of the Eaton family or company.

Businessman Sidney Hermant stated that it is now perfectly clear that we are not trying to get around the will. We must recognize that young people are quite sensitive about these things. But it is a sound administrative decision."

Prof W.B. Coutts said that "there is enough question about the ethical propriety of the sale that we should not make any money."

Chairman James Joyce maintained that the university was living up to the spirit of the will because "Miss Bilton was interested in the preservation of small shops and the new mall will include small shops."

Before any other members could comment, the discussion was terminated. Only Coutts and student member Howard Levitt opposed the sale. Graduate student representative Barry Mitchell voted for the sale.

At the same meeting administrative staff representative Gwen Russell and U of T vice-president Jill Conway presented a report on inequities in appointments, promotions and salaries of non-academic women employees of the university.

The report found that in the three highest salary groups there are 109 men and four women and in the administrative assistant level Class I there were 37 women and 12 men while at the Class II level there were 24 men and 12 women.

It also found the "job description system appears to assign responsibility to males regardless of the actual disposition of duties carried on by women non-academic staff."

The study also revealed a need "for clearer delineation of secretarial responsibilities in order to control situations where a secretary is required to perform a number of tasks not directly connected with the university for her boss."

Conway and Russell recommended that the university replace its policy of following outside employment practices "by a bold attempt to move away from sex typing in job classification".

The committee agreed to set up a joint sub-committee with the internal affairs committee to deal with policy changes suggested by the inquiry and rectify individual cases of discrimination administratively through Conway's office.

Conway and Russell demanded that the confidentiality of the women they interviewed for the study be maintained as the women were reluctant to reveal their names for fear of losing their jobs.

A decision was also made to increase a housing loan fund which provides mortgages for U of T faculty and staff from $4.5 million to $7 million after negotiations with the U of T Faculty Association. The present salary ceiling of $25,000 was removed despite of objections from Levitt who said this would mean "subsidizing the wealthy."

The meeting moved into closed session to consider the financial statements of the university for the year ending April 30, 1973.

No action was taken on the report of a successful experiment involving a four day work week involving workers at the Medical Sciences building.

If the U of T has its way, New Hometown Press will be booted off the campus. The administration is afraid a commercial operation will mean a shift in its tax holiday. Does this mean U of T Press and Varsity Arena isn't shovelling in the bread any longer?

Where are all the papers?

Should you be as remiss as to show up at the campus on Monday and should you be as dedicated as to search for your only link to reality, to wit, this newspaper, this notice serves to tell you to forget it. Taking advantage of any excuse to revert to our normal slothful behaviour, the staff of the Varsity will not produce on Monday, October 8. Weep not, we shall return as normal on Wednesday. That's normal? you ask?

Anyways, due to this holiday we need an extra dose of hot words and action, so this shall also serve as an invitation to our weekly staff meeting. But you're not a member of our staff, you think. Well, what better way to become a staff member by wandering up to the second floor of 91 St. George St. at 1 pm today and immersing yourself in the quest for "the Big Scoop?" That damned scoop gets closer every day and wouldn't you like to be here when it comes by land, air or sea? How can you pass up this glorious chance?

There's more than enough room for anybody, especially beginners.

"Distorted logic weaves in and out of sanity throughout the meeting", SAC vice-president Mike Scott at Wednesday's SAC meeting

Students need athletic control

Undergraduate students at this university are being asked to vote October 17 and 18 in a campus-wide referendum, including questions on athletics policy, student role in staffing decisions and membership in the National Union of Students. Last Friday and Monday we stated our position on parity and the student role in staffing decisions. Today we deal with athletics policy.

The Students' Administrative Council is asking the question: "Do you support the establishment of a student majority on a unified directorate governing men's and women's athletics at the University of Toronto?" We do and we'll explain why. But judge for yourself, and if you're still not convinced drop in to the SAC office and talk to someone about the athletics policy.

To begin with, according to the latest available figures (1971-72) students pay for well over 50 per cent of the total annual operating costs of the men's athletics program. Of a total budget of $341,421 in 1971-72, you and I paid $201,901. The university administration didn't put up one penny.

Furthermore, the University of Toronto Athletic Association (men) "Report on Finances 1970-71 and Estimates 1971-72" noted that from 1914-72 the men had always paid the full cost of the program. Ironically, the men's association had even paid construction costs for the stadium and arena totalling $1,366,904.34 up to 1971, again with no subsidies from the university or the provincial government. (This sum included interest paid to the Board of Governors—the predecessor to the Governing Council — for the financing of capital construction.) This same negligent university administration then saw fit to lease the arena to the Toronto Toros of the World Hockey Association for over 25 evenings this coming season, thereby eliminating ice time needed for student purposes.

And, unbelievably, we've paid for most of that building ourselves (through gate receipts and concessions' profits from intercollegiate games over the past 40 or 50 years). A nice trick if it works — the university gets the students to pay and then decides that "he who pays the piper doesn't call the tune".

Worst of all, only two years ago the administration increased the men's athletic fee from $15 to $20 per year without even holding a referendum on the issue. (Elsewhere in this province — at the University of Waterloo and Western, for example, students have been asked to approve a fee hike.)

Even though the university has complete control over the athletics funds (it "gives" money to the UTAA through a rebate system) the athletic association has little control over the fixed costs which consume most of its budget. Operating costs, for example, include expenditures for salaries, pensions, health and unemployment insurance, and arena and stadium maintenance.

The present governing structure of the men's UTAA is known as the Athletic Directorate, composed of 20 members. Although students pay for over half of the annual operating budget for the department, there are only seven student representatives on the Directorate. The student representation consists of five elected members, one member from the Students' Administrative Council, and one member appointed by and from the Intramural Sports Committee. (Four of the five elected student representatives come indirectly from the elitist, intercollegiate sports.)

Other Directorate members include seven representatives from teaching or senior administrative staff of the university (appointed by the President), the President of the university, two representatives elected annually by the Advisory Board, the Director of the University Health Service, the Director of Athletics, and the Assistant Director.

The method used to elect the five student representatives to the Directorate is nothing short of a farce. These members are not in the least representative of the various athletic constituencies existing on this campus. Elections are held on an electoral college basis, with intercollegiate clubs electing four of the five representatives. Only one student is elected from college and faculty athletic associations, but the overwhelming majority of students participate at this level.

And within the intercollegiate representative body two of the four members must come from football, hockey, or basketball clubs. In the 1971-72 season the football and hockey teams spent $59,000 out of a total of $100,000 allocated for intercollegiate sports — leaving $41,000 for the other 20 intercollegiate clubs. By comparison the intramural program only received $11,000. The system at the present time is totally undemocratic.

For 1972-73, three of the five intercollegiate student members on the Directorate are associated with Varsity hockey, even though two of the three are chosen from other areas in the weird electoral college system. The present system serves to perpetuate the top-heavy, elitist structure. And yet students pay for over half the operating budget.

Ironically, the Athletic Directorate was composed of a total of 25 student members from the years 1893 to 1900. (But at that time the university realized that it would have to move in to protect its interests.) The Women's Athletic Directorate is considerably more democratic than its UTAA counterpart. Fifteen of the 22 members on the women's directorate are students, and they represent intramural, not intercollegiate athletics. Since the women students do pay all of the operating costs the potential for control of these costs is open to them.

A further point to remember is that although intercollegiate athletics has remained constant over the years with respect to the rate of participation, intramurals has suffered a decline. A 1962 Presidential Committee on the Athletic Programs noted that "in 1944-45 the participation rate of males in athletics had been over 52 per cent, and then dropped to 38 per cent in 1960-61. Today (1962) the per cent of participation of males stands at about 33 per cent." (And it's lower in 1973.) Intramurals could be strong again if students controlled the program so that it served a majority of students on campus, and not the present elitist system.

According to men's intramural director Dave Copp the intramural program has been forced to cut back on its desired program, as well as limiting the number of teams in competition and to some degree, even the periods of play.

The dropped or desired programs have included an interfaculty swim league, indoor tennis and badminton, floor hockey and ball hockey, and inner tube water polo. Squash and volleyball are severely restricted.

We feel it's about time the unjust system of administering athletics stopped. Students should regain control — in all senses of the word — over athletic policy formation.

Will Levitt review Act?

Student governor Howie Levitt can't seem to make up his mind whether or not he's going to sit on the administration's 15 member committee to review the 1971 U of T Act. But perhaps some pressure from students and fellow SAC reps will stop Levitt from selling out to what we feel is an illegitimate committee.

Only two weeks ago when students lost yet another attempt to have parity on the committee Levitt charged that the structure of the committee would have a prejudicial effect on the outcome of the review. He never did clarify what that meant but we can only surmise that the numbers on the committee tell the story.

Another student governor, Gord Barnes appeared to be more concerned with representing the interests of students. He said at the time that he would "never agree to sit on the review committee" and went so far as threatening to resign from the council.

At Wednesday's SAC meeting

Levitt said that he felt the students on the committee should give it a month to come up with some definite recommendations to reform the U of T Act, and if nothing happened then students would resign. Levitt should realize by now that the administration is not serious about any major restructuring of the power structure of this university — that was demonstrated in 1971 when students lost parity on the Governing Council. To accept a seat on the review committee is to recognize the legitimacy of a body which has no validity — at least from the students' point of view.

We don't really understand what Levitt's game is — maybe he'll write us a letter and clarify his position.

The administration expects our representatives to sit on a body that is bound to outvote them. That's like asking us to participate in our own educational manipulation.

Ironically Levitt was elected to the Governing Council on a "reform slate". But we wonder whether he's becoming the Paul Cadario of 1973?

Loyalist beware

Ulli Diemer in his "Watsup" peekaboo at the week's books (Review, September 21), refers to Edwin C. Guillet as "one of the breed of academics up to his ears in the great conspiracy to make Canadian history seem as dull as possible."

Guillet is not an academic; he was for many years probably Ontario's most successful non-guild historian. He has also made a significant contribution to our knowledge of the material culture and lifeways of the ordinary men and women who were Ontario's first European settlers. Guillet's contribution to our understanding of the lives and times of the pioneers has been far from definitive but until recently has been unmatched. Mr. Diemer might be advised to save his kneejerk response to anyone less revisionist than Leandre Bergeron and less heroic than Harold Innis for the nipping constitutional historians and Loyalist hagiographers who deserve it.

Freedom apolitical

This letter is in reply to the editorial of September 26 which seemed essentially an encouragement for leftists to recognize the repressions of the left (in order to stifle the right) and win new victories for the cause of socialism; and in refutation of the blatant propaganda which certain deceived or intentionally deceiving individuals are set on writing.

Interpretations of recent events, both in the world of action and of opinion, have pointed to an undeniable fact of modern understanding - the politicization of universal values and morality. Among these, the one perhaps most widely cherished, yet so stridently abused, is freedom. There is no political label which one can apply exclusively to freedom. Freedom is an apolitical concept, except when it must adopt political means to protect itself; for just as surely as freedom is open and seemingly passive, tyranny is unrelenting and forceful. But the wisdom of any political philosophy when compared to another must be negligible from the point of view of freedom. It is intellectual imperialism for any ideology to claim the bounty of freedom as the unique result of its own program.

The political person is easy prey for the acceptance of a biased sense of freedom; prejudice exists in this world not only on a racial footing. As long as he is provided with the means and opportunity for the practice of a certain ideological persuasion, and is allowed to live under a code of ethics which comforts him, he is willing to grant freedom indeed exists. But an individual must also be granted an opportunity for defending his beliefs against philosophical and material encroachment on his rights to free expression. Such a defence can and should be allowed to take the form of a declaration of his own beliefs regardless of those convictions which are widely held (or imposed).

It is this state of affairs which is distinctly absent under any regime of totalitarian nature, where the political presence dictates against individual conscience and freedom. Close mindedness on the part of political authority is the ultimate subversion of freedom. It is political repression which has applied restrictions on the freedom of the citizens of the Soviet Union and other east block countries, just as vigorously as in the dictatorships of the right, in Greece, Spain, Latin America, and elsewhere.

The political orientation of a great portion of the Western intelligentsia has resulted in a blindness towards the actual ramifications of a forced political state of common ideology. The egalitarian sympathies of many politically oriented groups are undetermined by virtue of their bias towards subversions of the left. True humanitarians cannot be selective in their convictions. It is just such a dilemma which has recently been pointed out by the Soviet physicist Sakharov, in reference to Russian policy concerning closer ties with the West.

McCarthyism did America a great disservice by rendering inappropriate and embarrassing an acceptance of claims against the cruelty of communist tyranny. (Overzealousness always makes people apprehensive). The clearest example of such an effect lies in the emergence of the Siberian death camps as an appeal to humour. While Belsen and Auschwitz by their sheer weight of horror render any lightness ludicrous and inhumane, a situation of like savagery and barbarism, which has never been opened to similar detailed observation, remains the subject of jest. One wonders why people are incapable of seeing the possibilities of a parallel to the slaughter of innocents in Germany.

What the truth sadly comes down to is a realization that tremendous vocalism can be a vehicle for compassion - the advertisement of suffering, and the selling of souls can bring some consciousness of political horrors. People want statistical proofs. Rhetoric, however, is too frequently uninforming and often serves the interests of one specific group instead of the whole. One example of this is the success of Jews by weight of their international powers of mobilization to bring to light the policies of the Soviet government re: emigration and religion. The fact which escapes notice is that such policies affect to a greater or lesser degree all citizens of the USSR; the predicament is common and should be seen as such. But too often even a demonstration of horror is not sufficient; too often injustice on a large enough scale passes for justice. However one should maintain a profound faith in the sufferers of injustice - in Chile, in Czechoslovakia, in Mozambique, and elsewhere.

The economic orientation of socialist political philosophy has decided against a wider view of the human condition under any political system. Therefore, the writings of too many so-called experts on the Soviet Union have exhibited a dispassionate analysis of economic progress. The success of Stalinist principles of a directed and planned economy should be chronicled with notice given to the parallel success of the economic policies of Adolf Hitler in building up Germany. (One slaughtered Jews, the other kulaks). Success by terror has nothing to say about the efficacy of an economic ideology. Repressions spur successes of a hopelessly limited kind.

If freedom is without political colouring, imperialism and international treachery are also; the designs of large states should always be anticipated and opposed - just as the Soviet Union in Czechoslovakia, so the United States in the Dominican Republic and Vietnam. They exist only as the results of political power-seeking. If economic imperialism in Canada is frowned upon by the enlightened, the combined effects of social, political and cultural hegemony which the Soviet Union holds over the Baltic States can only be considered of far greater gravity. The sheer weight of doctrinaire rhetoric should obscure the fact that the Soviet Union is one of the last remaining great exponents of determined, multi-form imperialism. The extent of American imperialism is a foregone conclusion, yet the White House does not for instance maintain a fixed program of ethnic genocide, i.e., the forced intermingling of certain small ethnic groups with an immigrant and massive Russian block. (Racial uniformity can be just as effective a tool of bigotry and efficiency as racial elitism - the smaller republics in the USSR face the prospect of possessing native minorities in the face of the planned inflow of Russian workers and families.)

It remains a cardinal sin for observers to make assertive statements about lands outside their direct experience. No more could a summer visitor to the Soviet Union draw conclusions about living conditions than an American tourist in a Puerto Rican resort. And yet the arrogance of self-serving rhetoric continues (as illustrated in your assertion that ethnic minorities in the Soviet Union are leftist, and therefore purely politically motivated) - and the nations of the world will suffer injustice and tyranny because of just such political declarations.

Until individuals and states come to realize the improbability of a "politics of freedom", the pleas of the subjugated will go as mute, and will even be denied in deference to political interests.

Hubert Van Eyck

P.S.: Despite the undercurrent of political orientation connected with the university newspaper, I hope that the legitimacy of common virtues will not go unnoticed and that one person's convictions will not be disregarded. My knowledge is personal not dogmatic - my parents were forced to flee the Soviet occupation of the Baltic States. For whatever feeling is worth nowadays, I sympathize with those who suffer under conditions of political tyranny and condemn the doctrinaire enemies of freedom through the world no matter what their philosophy. Of course, most people will construe my avowed as the prejudice of experience.

Mezvinisky again

The recent speech given by Dr. Norton Mezvinisky to the Arab Student Association raises several fundamental questions regarding the role of nationalism in Third World politics. The solution to the Arab-Israeli deadlock outlined by Dr. Mezvinisky involves the "dezonization" of the State of Israel and its replacement by a democratic secular state which will respect the rights of all peoples in Palestine. Such a solution, however reasonable it may seem at first glance, is neither realistic nor particularly desirable within the context of the emergence of Third World nationalism in general, and Arab and Jewish nationalism in particular.

One the one hand, Mezvinisky's analysis neglects to take into account the very potent and positive reality of modern Jewish nationalism both within Israel and also among world Jewry. It is becoming increasingly apparent that the basis of "Jewishness" is no longer determined by a mere adherence to the Jewish religion. For millions of Jews throughout the world the essence of "Jewishness" is identification with the concept of Jewish "peoplehood", which necessarily involves commitment to Jewish language, culture, and nationality. To the extent that Dr. Mezvinisky denies the Jewish people the right to nationhood by advocating the "dezonization" of the state of Israel, his otherwise commendable concern for "equality" and "democracy" in Palestine is tarnished. Would Dr. Mezvinisky grant Arabs the right to exercise their national prerogatives while at the same time deny Jews the very same basic right? Indeed when supporters of the Palestinian Arab movement proclaim that they are not anti-Jewishness has taken two distinct but related forms. The first is the denial to Jews of the right to physical existence as human beings. (The Nazi destruction of European Jewry.) The second is the denial to Jews of the right to exist as members of the Jewish people. By adopting this second form of anti-Jewishness, anti-Zionists are also implicitly (perhaps inadvertently) adopting the first form of anti-Jewishness. Without the mechanisms of the machineries of the nation-state, the Jewish people will not be able to protect the national and indeed physical security of its corporal entity.

On the other hand, Dr. Mezvinisky's desire to replace Israel with a secular democratic state also ignores the realities of Palestinian Arab nationalism. For the creation of such a state would be in reality the creation of another Arab national state in which the Jews would be a large but rather powerless minority. Indeed, the Palestine Liberation Organization gains its strength from the ideology of Pan-Arab nationalism. Witness, for example, the tremendous resources spent by all Arab countries in support of their Palestinian brothers.

Since when have states such as Libya, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, and Syria been the vanguard of support for the most fundamental principles of justice, freedom, and human dignity? The basis of their support for Palestinian Arabs is clearly Pan-Arab nationalism. The Arab states have deemed it desirable to protect the national interests of Palestinian Arabs. This is a legitimate concern on their part. But to disguise this concern behind demands for a non-sectarian, non-nationalistic democratic state in Palestine is most deceptive. Are we really to expect that the powerful forces of Palestinian Arab nationalism will suddenly dissipate with the dezonization of the State of Israel? Hardly.

It is clear that the potency of both Jewish and Arab nationalism will not allow a settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict unless both sides recognize the inherent validity of the other's national movement. Not only does Dr. Mezvinisky's proposal to dezonize Israel ignore this basic reality, but it also ignores the undesirability of defusing the national movements of Jews and Arabs: as evidenced by the experiences in Chile, Cuba, and Viet Nam, the legitimate protection of the interests of Third World peoples necessarily involves the development and nurturing of national movements. What is required in the Middle East is the establishment of an Arab Palestinian State on the West Bank of the Jordan River which will live in peace with the State of Israel. The solution is basically very simple; the mechanisms required to bring it about, unfortunately are not.

Gov't survey finds lead near Canada Metal

Lead level findings by the province's air management branch near the Canada Metal Co. Ltd. Eastern Avenue plant appear to support a survey of the area completed by U of T's Institute of Environmental Studies.

The U of T study indicated that the plant was responsible for metal dust and lead contamination from 10 to 80 times the normal city levels.

The report also showed that one site about 200 yards from the plant registered the equivalent of 44 tons of dustfall a square mile over 30 days.

The provincial government's air management branch found lead levels "among the highest ever recorded in Metro Toronto" in soil samples near the Canada Metal Company's plant.

Plant ecologist P.J. Temple found that both vegetation and soil near the plant "was heavily contaminated with lead compared with control samples." The report added that "this contamination extended as far at least as far as Dundas Street to the north and Leslie Street to the east of the source."

After U of T's report was released, Canada Metal president Carleton Smith claimed that the company has a long record of pollution control. He also said that the firm is working with the air management branch to reduce lead and dust emissions even further. A new filter room and an 85-foot smokestack are scheduled improvements in the plant's operation.

In our story Wednesday on "Profs want student voice" we misquoted Chris Plowright. He did not say that a mechanism must be established whereby "students with fair and balanced judgements, not radical and political students" can be selected to sit on hiring, staffing, and promotion committees. Plowright said that "If it's decided that students should be seated on committees the problem is how to select them."

We also incorrectly identified student Dave Loughton as Doug Lawton in a page one picture Wednesday.

Fairview criticized at City Hall

By DAVID LIPTON

The Eaton-Fairview plan to turn part of downtown Toronto into a shopping center ran into more trouble at a Tuesday night meeting of City Hall's Committee of Adjustment.

Fairview Corporation, represented by lawyer Thomas Deacon, requested the committee's approval for the creation of sites for future development. However, he refused to discuss the corporation's intended use of the newly-created construction sites.

The opponents to Fairview's plans were numerous. But on this evening, Greg King, representing the Better Downtown Planning Corporation, did most of the arguing for the anti-Fairview group.

The debate in the committee room centered on whether the creation of new sites (in this instance the severance of city land from the city's control) was related to its intended use.

Deacon argued that it was not the committee's business to analyse the intended use of the severed land. In his view the committee's sole task was to deal with the technical problem whether the severance was correctly described.

King argued that the committee should be interested in the future use of the city's land. The land had to be used for some purpose, he argued, and that was the reason for its severance. King concluded that the use of land was inseparable from the severance issue.

The committee members seemed unable to make up their minds until Ward 10 alderman Colin Vaughan suggested that the meeting be postponed for two weeks. By that time, the committee will have decided whether the issues of severance and usage are intertwined or not.

The battle over the Eaton Fairview project will be long. Regardless of the committee's decision, the losing side will appeal to a higher decision-making body, such as the Ontario Municipal Board.

Erindale residences cheap at $80 a month

By DENNIS RAK

Erindale College has come up with a new style of student residences — completely equipped townhouses where students can live on a communal basis.

The seven campus townhouses are each made up of several self-contained units. Four-person units have four single study-bedrooms, living room and kitchen. Six-person units have two double study-bedrooms, two single bedrooms plus the same communal living and kitchen areas.

This communal setting makes it possible for students to share living expenses on a co-op basis, contributing a certain amount of money per week. By cooking their own meals, students feel they can save as much as $200 by the end of the year.

Each unit is completely furnished and carpeted. All appliances, a stove and refrigerator, all cooking utensils and dishes are included. All the student has to bring is a supply of sheets, pillowcases, and towels. Laundry facilities are also provided in each townhouse complex.

In case students become too attached to some of the Erindale amenities, inventory is taken at the end of each year. If anything is missing, the students of that unit would be responsible.

The cost to students for a single room is $630 per year from September to May and $580 for a double room over the same period.

Final completion of the townhouses is now scheduled for October 14. By this date, the remaining 100 of the 290 resident students will have moved in.

Temporary accommodation has been provided in the meantime in surrounding motels, a nursing residence and the Erindale gymnasium. Transportation to and from the college is supplied by scheduled bus service.

Arnold Brody, finance commissioner for the Student's Administrative Government of Erindale feels many factors were responsible for the delay in completing the residences by the mid-August deadline.

An early start on the project was not possible because of the extremely wet spring this year. A high water table forced postponement of initial excavations until April. A shortage of both skilled help and building materials throughout the summer was a reflection of the mid-year housing development boom in the Toronto area. Numerous short trade strikes didn't help matters either.

If the student resident population at Erindale declines, the townhouses can also be rented to families.

Communal living has arrived in the suburbs. These co-op townhouses will open Oct. 14 at Erindale campus.

Flash! Dr. John signs with CPC

University president John Evans signed a petition which was also signed by the leader of the Communist Party of Canada, William Kashtan.

D.F. Forster, university vice-president and provost, signed underneath his boss' name as did Nelson Clarke of the Metro Communist Party.

Another Varsity typo, you say? Wrong it was published in the Globe and Mail. Wednesday morning's coffee-sipping edition carried an advertisement denouncing the coup in Chile signed by hundreds of notables and not-so-notables.

Evans, Kashtan, Forster, Clarke and virtually the entire correct-line reform caucus of Toronto city's council were listed. Bet you didn't read the small print.

The Globe was kind enough, however, to run a second petition with names in large type for the bleary-eyed.

This one is easier: John Evans is lined up with others such as Wayne and Shuster, Gerald LeDain (of marijuana fame), Farley Mowat, ex-university president Claude Bissell, Montreal FLQ lawyer Robert Lemieux, Mark Harrison (nobody is perfect at the Toronto Star), and Leonard Cohen.

In this petition, Dr. Evans, et al., "deplore" the "campaign of harassment" in Russia against Andrei Sakharov and Alexander Solzhenitsyn. Visibly evident in this second petition are the lack of Messrs Clarke and Kashtan's names.

Honorable mention to Mel Watkins for making it on both of them without once mentioning waffle breakfasts.

Westworld: act out fantasies with Yul Bryner

Imagine a Disneyland for grown-ups, split into three sections, Medievalworld, Romanworld and Westworld; an amusement park that charges $1000 a day, with no rules, "Where you can live out your every whim". Welcome to Delos, the futuristic complex containing 'Westworld', now playing at the Imperial 5 (of six) and neighbourhood theatres throughout the metropolis.

Chicago boys Richard Benjamin and James Brolin, back at Westworld for his second time, are vacationing in this realistic old western town, complete with saloon fights bank robberies and traditional shoot-outs. The guests live out their fantasies with the help of life-like robots, who really bleed, featuring Yul Bryner as Benjamin's chief target.

Although "nothing ever goes wrong" in this tomorrowland, some of the robots have central malfunctioning problems and start to disobey their programmed orders. Bryner rebels and decides to kill Benjamin, tracking him throughout the different worlds of Delos. This pursuit is partially visualized through the robot's eyes.

During the film, director Michael Crichton shows us glimpses of all three worlds, plus the central control, the area that ensures the robots are programmed to fulfill all the guests desire. Crichton develops this underground area well, showing the operating areas, where the robots are healed by doctor-like technicians in white, and the command area with numerous panels and computers monitoring all the robots actions, each panel with a human supervisor.

Crichton, the creator of The Andromeda Strain, does a credible job of capturing the atmosphere of this central command, complete with the trivial background discussions, as well as portraying the specific decadence involved with each world.

Richard Benjamin, finally released from Jewish schmuck roles like Portnoy, in Portnoy's Complaint, captures the character of the Chicago lawyer who can not believe that he can take whatever he wants. While at the local bordello he is undecided whether to go to bed with one of the machines, or to stop the bank robbery occurring out in the street. He opts for the former, and tries to explain to his new friend that he never has had a prostitute.

Brolin, as the veteran of this life, seems right at home in Westworld, a little different from his weekly role assisting Marcus Welby, on TV.

Yul Bryner returning to the days of The Magnificent Seven has very little to say, as he spends most of his time either dead, dying or pursuing Benjamin.

Westworld, like the other two land of Delos, may be the "dream come true" for most of us. It combines violence, sex and no authority, a place where no one really gets hurt and there are no penalties. But you are never really sure who is a robot and who is a guest.

Just a brief note on the short that played with Westworld, Propaganda Message. This 1971 National Film Board short lists some of the problems and possible solutions facing this great which pokes fun at all Canadians, no matter the race, color or creed.

State of Siege is correct, but arid Rarity and quality are different things. State of Siege, the new film by Costa-Gavras who previously made Z and The Confession is rare. It's a left-wing political film, perhaps the most left-wing political film ever made with capitalist money. True, as a friend pointed out, its Tupamaros (Uruguayan urban guerrillas) are about as temperate taking as New Democratic Youth but by movie standards that is pretty heavy: most movie revolutionaries take a position on a parallel with the Sierra Club's.

In State of Siege a well-organized band of Tupamaros kidnap the Brazilian ambassador, and an American expert in "traffic and communications" stationed in their country through the American Alliance for International Development. While the government chases them down, the guerillas interrogate their hostages, revealing that they were not random choices: the Brazilian government, through its ambassador, supplies the Uruguayan police with the newest technological innovations in torture equipment; the American is actually an expert in counter-insurgency, his job masked by the AID appointment. (State of Siege was dropped as the opening presentation by the new American Film Institute theatre, because the Institute's director thought it glamorized political kidnapping. More accurately, it is the first film to credit kidnapers with being selective. Pierre LaPorte was a victim, but not an innocent victim.)

Costa-Gavras' movie follows quite literally the pattern of events in Uruguay, 1970. The government refuses the guerillas' demand for an exchange of political prisoners. "There are no political prisoners in our country, only common criminals", a spokesman announces in a statement very close to Pierre Trudeau's response to the FLQ. The guerillas vote to kill the American. When his body is discovered he is given a state funeral and a day of mourning as a national symbol of American help to Latin America.

State of Siege comes with a priori bite. The film was made in Chile with the co-operation of Salvador Allende, since murdered (lets call a spade a spade) by the villains characterized in the movie. There is a grizzly irony in Costa-Gavras' opening scenes of hundreds and hundreds of soldiers and police—borrowed from the Allende government?—massively hunting down fugitive left-wingers. Presumably the only difference now is the bullets. The American government's hasty recognition of the Chilean coup, and Canada's only slightly slower acknowledgement add resonance to the film. Mitchell Sharp's claim that recognition had nothing to do with politics is oddly similar to the plea made by the kidnapped Brazilian diplomat in the movie. (Prior to his government posts, Sharp was vice-president of Brazilian Light and Traction, now Brascan, the Canadian-owned electricity monopoly in Brazil. He also chaired the International Coffee Convention that fixed a ten-year low price for coffee, advantageous to us but at the expense of the coffee producers in Latin America. There are, in fact, many connections between our government and the forces of stability State of Siege draws.) This is a powerful film, one that might have been called "dangerous" in the fifties, not because of a sympathetic portrayal of kidnapers, but because it gives the lie to North American claims about foreign aid and development. Not the usual movie fare.

But rarity is not quality, and too many people, stunned by the unaccustomed content (or by guilt) are misattributing the film's effect and mistaking State of Siege for a much better movie than it is. Propaganda based on fact is still propaganda, a not particularly worthy art.

Costa-Gavras' Tupamaros bundling Yves Montand into a van in State of Siege (top) may be making a worthwhile political point. But it's not enough for a movie to be political. James Coburn with his champagne and his yacht (centre) in The Last of Sheila is making a political point too — he's pushing conspicuous consumption. State of Siege lacks finesse, and it doesn't even have old-fashioned suspense, like the attempt to murder DeGaulle in Day of the Jackal (bottom).

Take away our outside concern and this is a dull, muddled, thinly developed action picture, one that pales no less than the rest of the genre when compared to The Day of the Jackal.

Leaving the theatre my principal feeling was chagrin. I had hoped to walk exultantly down the line-up to the next show: some of these people would receive their first challenge to the airy post-Kennedy myth of international charity; they might get their first sense of what drives revolutionary underground, their first knowledge of how "partisans" become known as "terrorists" and dismissed as "criminals". This, while not much, would be something to shore against the Chilean bullies and their North American aid. But having seen the film I also felt embarrassed: I didn't want people to know that Marxists could make as bad movies as anybody else.

Political art, even more than other kinds of art, is an exercise in translation, translation from an idea to some, well, objective correlative that provides momentum, rhythm, colour and excitement to hold you until you translate back to the original, or even some other idea. Costa-Gavras' is very thinly veiled polemic. His Tupamaros are bores, speaking with the arid humanism of Young Socialist pamphlets, and with the pedantic rush of detail of highschool history texts. They are full of dates, figures and clerical reports attesting to intrigues and tortures. Certainly they are right and, stretching beyond the movie, true, but this is thunderously dull dialogue — monologue to be more accurate. Yves Montand as the captured American super-bully, glows by comparison. His weary, wise features and cautious replies begin to count for more than they should, as if he were the only human being on an island of parrots.

Costa-Gavras may raise political consciousness, but he blunts the powers of observation and judgement. At one point a young Tupamaro interrogator tells Montand that his countrymen become soldiers and police because of hunger, not vocation. Montand denies it, arguing that they could also become thieves. "I believe", he says, "that a real man has a choice". "We don't believe in real men" the Tupamaro shoots back, "but in human beings". One assumes that this motherhood rejoinder was meant to top Montand's: one fears that, for many it does. In fact, it makes about as much sense as John Wayne's great fascist non-sequitur in True Grit: Wayne has just drunkenly disposed of a rat with his six-gun when a crony objects that due process had not been observed. Wayne answers "you can't serve papers on a rat".

(My assumption that the line is to be accepted unsepectically may not be justified. The script for State of Siege is by Franco Solinas who wrote The Battle of Algiers, a political film that carefully bared its heroes' brutality and smallness and its villains' good intentions. Here, Solinas may just have been swamped by Costa-Gavras' rhetorical swash-buckling style.)

It is Montand's contention that real men have choice, and some of his other contentions, that leave some room for supposition; it is his character that has some negative capability. Otherwise, the bad-guys wear black hats, and the heroes, as Tom Walkom put it, all look like they were cast for the clean-cut-student picture Paper Chase, the preview of which accompanies State of Siege at the Fairlawn. The artistic fascination of the revolutionary is his terrible beauty, the drama is his acceptance of the low road — Che Guevara's choice to rescue the ammunition before the medical supplies. If these Tupamaros face those sorts of quandaries it is off-screen. When they come on-screen, they leave their urgency, character and much of their humanity.

In part this is the fault of Costa-Gavras' $100,000 dubbing job, which while it is in sync, has the same flat, empty, mid-American ring of all other dubbed films. Perhaps the Chilean cast had some of their native passion in their voices. Even more glaring is the fact that Yves Montand's beautiful voice has been scrapped in order one assumes, to eliminate his accent. (Imagine John Wayne opening his mouth to reveal Richard Benjamin's voice.)

There is nothing inherently unusual about political movies. Most movies are political: pro-consumption, pro-authority pro-cop. As Pete Seeger used to say, "The most political song I ever heard was Pack Up Your Troubles in Dreams". Debunking but vague movies have become common and popular. Openly ideological movies however are still scarce, and the few that there are tend to suffer, like State of Siege from their makers' zeal. Lindsay Anderson's films (This Sporting Life, I, ..., and O Lucky Man) are exceptions, making the translation from pamphlet to art so thoroughly that the "point" is diffused. Anderson's art is so much greater than Costa-Gavras' that one could never leave the theatre with the simple informed anger that the maker of Z and State of Siege solicits.

Perhaps it is an unfair comparison: Costa-Gavras is, like an attorney, out to convince us of facts. He succeeds, in part through boredom. (If something is boring enough it must be true; thus we remain sceptical of his recreation of a Brazilian school for torturers, but are thoroughly convinced when a teary-eyed woman parliamentarian waves the report of the all-parties commission into illegal police practices. The papers she holds up are probably her script, but we know, somewhere, the report she cites has to exist, and we know damn well it hasn't been acted on.) State of Siege achieves the factuality it strives for, but usually art tries to go beyond facts. It is perhaps one's duty to be cognizant of the workings of imperialism, since it provides the income and luxury we enjoy, but a movie seems an odd place to go to out of duty.

Twenty years journalism: scoops and vative, cautious as an old man for all his youth, with a basic distrust of the people"; LBJ: "a man the whole world has begun to distrust"; Senator Fulbright: "a drowsy watchdog"; Nixon "the evil of banality".

He was one of the very few to openly and continually defy McCarthy from the beginning; he exposes the lunacy and dangers of hysterical anti-communism and the Cold War; he documents white racism and the struggle against it; watches the hypocrisy of all the major powers during the Hungary events ("The Workers Rise Against the Workers' State"); covers Vietnam (the U.S. sees "the Vietnamese uprising simply as a communist plot, and communism as an occult conspiracy with magical powers whereby a handful of infiltrating agitators can 'infect' a whole population with Marxism-Leninism though these same natives can barely read the directions on a can of soup"). He drove home hard truths about the "third worlds" ("In the Name of Marx as Once in the Name of Jesus"); wrote critically yet sympathetically about both sides in the Middle East.

And he writes at greater length (as well as displaying greater depth) than the daily papers on the subjects he covers; the result is that, despite his biases, he is "objective" in that he always bases his analysis solidly on the facts.

He's not perfect, of course. Two of his main faults: he thinks very much in the tradition of a Jeffersonian liberal reformer (his heroes are Milton and Kropotkin). As a result, he can occasionally be puzzlingly anachronistic or naive. But an uncannily shrewd eye for what's really reality makes slips of that kind infrequent or at least inconsequential. Another problem: even though he has a better eye than most for social conditions, for the everyday non-events that collectively determine so much of history, he still falls significantly short on this score. The rise of the assembly-line or automation, decline in church-going, changing tastes in entertainment, that kind of thing, that's saying much about.

Nevertheless, they ought to be compulsory reading for every journalist who does radical journalism.

For that vocation, a number of qualities are required.

One is eclecticism, a wide background in the major (and minor) history of the entire world, a storehouse of esoteric knowledge, something that can ever be said. But the closer you come, the more you find out. Which isn't to say that the pedantic journalist — other qualities are of them is compatible with the academic book-curator.

Another essential is a cool head. Without that, the reporter (or the historian) is a journalist but a historian (or the present?) is reduced to being a white-collar trash collector. Necessary to be aware of, and to challenge, assumptions. A world-view is necessary. Point: the Pentagon's out 100 million documents through that without a concept of what they mean.

It also helps a great deal to have a tolerance (if the world-view is a number of conflicting world-views) then they can't all be correct, on the correct one (which, I think is demonstrably more correct than writing based on everything else being equal).

But, please note. Everything is usually, it isn't. Other things, ability and humour, count.

In the land once nurtured on the myth of George Washington and the cherry tree, the truth is threatening to become "inoperative". And it's not only the Richard Nixons, the J. Edgar Hoovers, the military monomaniacs of the Pentagon and the ubiquitous bureaucracies that are responsible. Even the universities and the press have been doing their part to lay it low, in an assault using not merely little hatchets, but verbal chain saws, flame throwers, and bulldozers.

In such a climate, a reporter has the option of being a cynic, a drunk, or a radical.

I.F. Stone made his choice in 1921, when, as an idealistic fourteen-year-old, he founded his first newspaper. He's been at it ever since; this idealistic 66-year-old has done as much as any other individual in his lifetime to keep the truth "operative" in America.

Stone worked for a number of papers during his career until 1953, when, unable to find a satisfactory job elsewhere (this was at the height of McCarthyism, remember) he founded his own paper, the imaginatively titled I.F. Stone's Weekly.

By keeping costs to a minimum, he was able to stay in the black even in the initial years; for a small but growing number (5300 in 1953, 20,000 in 1963, 70,000 in 1971), he was the most valuable and reliable source of news in the country.

The constraints of his situation, with no "contacts", no access to inner circles or privileged information, merely helped to keep him pursuing the type of journalism he practised so well. With a matchless instinct for the jugular, he specialized in sifting through the tons of government documents and torrents of official statements to find the contradictions, the real facts, the true importance of a situation. Against an officialdom that took its contempt for the ability of the people to remember yesterday's statements today straight from Orwell's Ministry of Truth in 1984 Stone pitted a memory like a steel trap. Along with it, there came a sense of what was historically important, and an intuition for what he calls "significant trivia". And courage. Imagine, a man who dared call McCarthy at his height "low-blow Joe". And all of it supremely perceptive and analytical, well-written, witty, and drawing on a vast, eclectic store of knowledge.

The pressures of age forced Stone to convert the Weekly to a bi-weekly, and finally, in 1971, to shut it down altogether. He continues to write though as brilliantly as ever, if less frequently, in the pages of the New York Review of Books. And his articles have been gathered together into four collections so far: The Haunted Fifties; In a Time of Torment; Polemics and Prophecies, and now, the most recent with selections covering the entire span of the Weekly's lifetime, The I.F. Stone's Weekly Reader.

The four volumes, or any one of them, are intellectual, aesthetic, and political delights.

One reason is the humour. Stone is serious, deeply serious, committed, and often appalled and angry at the truths he discovers. But he's aware that a ponderous, moralizing tone wins few converts; reading the articulate, urbane, and frequently witty Weekly was a reading pleasure, not a self-imposed penance dutifully performed. A selection of his headlines (so important in a paper) is a good foretaste of the rest:

- All Deliberate Speed — or How to Get Where You Don't Want to Go in 1,000 Years
- Nixon in the Footsteps of Popeye's Elder Statesman
- Lyndon Johnson Lets the Office Boy Declare "War"
- Suppose Not Negroes But Men of Property v. Being Beaten in Mississippi?
- The Deed Was Done Quickly, But It's Macbeth Who's Dead
- Why the Chinese 7th Fleet is in Long Island Sound
- Nixon About to Abolish Hunger "For All Time" — Again
- If Daddy Keeps at It, Luci, One Day You Won't Wake Up
- Lemay: Cave Man in a Jet Bomber
- If Only John F. Kennedy Were in Hans Christian Anderson
- Another Fact-Evading Mission

What that reflects is not simply a certain kind of cleverness, but a conception of communication quite different from, say, that of The Wall Street Journal, Peoples' Canada Daily News, or (dare we say it?) The Varsity.

Read Stone's collections of articles, and you're not merely getting old news reshaped, from a left-wing perspective; you're getting a profoundly valuable background in post-war history. He writes current history rather than simple news, and he's got an eye for detail, for facts, that the grand sweep of most history texts, with their attention to laws and treaties, tend to miss.

The major events and personalities of the age are vivisected in his pages:

John Foster Dulles: "Cold, Arrogant, and Ruthless"; Joe McCarthy: "our would-be Führer"; JFK: "when the tinsel was stripped away, a conventional leader, no more than an enlightened conserand Engels did tremendous journalism for the New York Daily Tribune, but, had they wielded the pen of a Mencken or an-Orwell, it would have been better still.

But perhaps the most important point of all revolves around the much misunderstood question of "objectivity". It's been frequently, and quite conclusively, demonstrated that the concept of objectivity is a myth. Without assumptions, without ways of interpreting sense-data, without a world-view (conscious or not) it's quite impossible to think, speak, or write. The "objective" schools of social science, like behaviourism or functionalism, are merely unaware of their own fundamental orientation to the status quo, and, additionally, are severely limited in the kinds of problems they can even comprehend or solve, even within their assumptions.

These facts are now conceded by all except the most neanderthal flat-earthers in the swamps of contemporary social science. Disastrously, though, the left has too often taken this as carte blanche to twist the news in its interests. (The commercial media do the same, of course, but from them it's to be expected: it's their role. Reality contradicts their world-view quite flagrantly.) By "twist" I don't mean biases: reality itself is biased, and there's nothing wrong with stressing the things you think are important. But it's the deliberate distortion of the truth (and occasional downright lying) that's so sick. Like saying a cause has massive support, when it has very little. Like Denying Marx ever made mistakes. Like calling a defeat a victory.

The ultimate exposure of that kind of mentality came in the Stalinist purge trials of the 1930's. There you had men confessing to the most incredible crimes which it was impossible they could have committed. Why? Yes, brainwashing, but of a particular kind. They confessed to preserve the Communist Party, temporarily, as they saw it, taken over by the usurper Stalin, but still the vehicle of revolution, something that would outlast Stalin. Rather than undermine the faith of the Russian, and the world's working class in the party, they were willing to sacrifice all honour and all standards. If it was necessary to lie (and die) to preserve the revolution (and its party), they were willing. This is a complete failure to understand the unity of ends and means. The same kind of intellectual muck still covers Russian society today, where the press is as controlled as ever. The simple truth of the dictum of the German marxist Rosa Luxemburg, that "freedom is always and exclusively freedom for the one who thinks differently...all that is instructive, wholesome and purifying in political freedom depends on this essential characteristic" has yet to dawn on them, or on many of their co-thinkers in the rest of the world.

Useful radical journalism is possible only if its practitioners recognize the importance of truth. Not because of abstract moral standards, an elite "Thought Police" privileged to publish, withhold, or twist the truth is established. And these things are the complete opposite of what is needed to create a socialist movement and socialist society. A radical journalist or publication has to be absolutely convinced that the truth, and its publication, can in the long run only be of benefit to the cause, that any other attitude is poisonous.

This becomes especially important when one understands the position of the radical media. In a society where the dominant cultural assumptions, the media and the schools, to list only some important examples, are all predominantly purveyors of the ideology of the capitalist status quo, the tasks are formidable. It means not only that the resources are infinitely less, but that there are massive obstacles, in the form of ideological indoctrination and hostility to new ideas, to overcome.

A left newspaper therefore will be addressing itself to a readership that is not convinced of its views, although generally open to new ideas and perspectives. Consequently, much more than papers in the ideological mainstream, it must fight to gain and keep the sympathetic attention of its readers.

These newsmen may think of themselves as hardnosed fact-finders, but claim "objectivity" when asked to interpret stories.

Incredibly, though, most left papers seem directed at the already converted, forever reinforcing their ossified views with stale jargon. George Orwell, a left-wing socialist whose opposition to the Communist Party and its ilk has often been incorrectly portrayed as right-wing, put it this way: "As soon as certain topics are raised, the concrete melts into the abstract and no one seems able to think of turns of speech that are not hackneyed: prose consists less of words chosen for the sake of their meaning, and more of phrases tacked together like the sections of a pre-fabricated henhouse."

A paper that reaches that stage is pretty well useless, no matter how "correct" its "line" is.

It's also important that a paper be well laid out, interesting, and well-written. Again, it's remarkable how few left papers seem to pay attention to this. It's almost as if there were a kind of underlying Judeo-Christian-Stalinist morality that made it a tenet that anything important or worthwhile must be acquired as painfully as possible. Certainly a lot of these papers are a purgatory for the mind.

Nor are they merely a ways down the road from the socialist heaven. As a minority of anthropologists, linguists, and writers have tried to point out (Noam Chomsky and George Orwell are good examples), social structure and language structure are intimately related. The majority of propaganda rags that try to pass themselves off as socialist are completely alien to the kind of clarity and freedom of thought that is the essential pre- and co-requisite of socialism.

You'll note, too, that many of these papers are no more collectively controlled than the Toronto Star.

This is traceable to a determination that nothing except the "correct line" shall ever creep into the pages of the paper. The idea that a paper should be a forum for debate, where the people they are trying to reach might give their opinions even explaining how they disagree with the paper's views — that seems largely unthought-of.

In this respect, a paper like I. F. Stone's Weekly also fell significantly short. A one-man operation concerned almost exclusively with national and world news, it was invaluable, but still limited. It didn't in itself impel its readers to act, to be more than passive subscribers.

For this, papers that solicited articles from its subscribers on the experiences of every-day life would be a step in the right direction. After all, there is little that is more radicalizing than the ordinary experiences of work, school, and city living, once they are reflected on. And little that is more interesting than reading about experiences you can identify with. That kind of approach might easily win more respect for socialists than a paper forever telling its readers what to think on every topic under the sun. That's what this society is all about: people forever telling you what to do and think.

The left, it is plain, has a lot to learn about using the media politically, effectively, and creatively. If we're not too proud to learn, from our mistakes and from others, we'll put it together yet.

Suspicious stranger prompts mystery mass

Mozart: Requiem Mass
Deutsche Gramophon

Romantic legends have a hard time dying, and the one that surrounds Mozart's Requiem Mass is no exception. The story has it that while in the last month of his life, when his health was at a disastrously low ebb, Mozart was visited by a tall stranger, all dressed in grey, with his face shadowed. This stranger gave Mozart a commission for a Requiem Mass, and left half of the fee as an advance. As it turned out, Mozart never lived to complete it, and his widow had to engage one of the composer's students to finish off the sketches just to get enough money to cover the funeral.

Well, this legend, like the one about Beethoven coming out of a coma and shaking his fist at the heavens just before his death, is what makes the music even more poignant than it could be on its own. In truth, Mozart was really visited by a stranger dressed in gray, but he was not the angel of death that legend makes him out to be. Also, Mozart really did fantasize in the last stages of his delirium that it was his own requiem he was writing, and this was ironically true.

The stranger was probably in the pay of an aristocrat, Count von Walsegg, who commissioned works from composers in secrecy, and presented them as his own to his friends. Exploitation by the ruling class? Sure, but without it we never would have had this magnificent mass.

Last season, Karel Ancerl conducted the work with the Toronto Symphony, and it was perhaps the most memorable concert he ever led in this city. I was literally transfixed by his interpretation of it, and it is tragic that his death robbed him of the chance to put it on vinyl.

In a new recording on Deutsche Gramophon, though, Karl Bohm comes pretty close to Ancerl's magnificent reading of the score. The soloists (Edith Mathis, Judith Hamari, Wieslaw Ochman and Karl Ridderbusch) are fine, and so is the highly competent Vienna Philharmonic, all turning in the intelligent and highly professional performances that their reputations and past recordings would lead us to expect. However, the bulk of the work is carried by the Chorus, in this case the Concert Ensemble of the Vienna State Opera. They sound like a chorus should, like a highly flexible instrument. When the score calls for the terror of the day of judgement (Dies Irae) they pour it on, yet the Agnus Dei is as sublime as could be hoped for.

I get the impression that this recording was a labour of love for all concerned. What's more, it stands as a testimony to Bohm's greatness as a Mozart conductor, as if we needed further proof of that. (His complete edition of the symphonies still stands as the one to match, let alone beat). The tempos all seem to fit the spirit of the music, and he resists whatever temptation there may have been to turn the highly dramatic passages into an operatic display of emotion.

This is a Requiem that Mozart would have been proud to hear. Bohm and his two hundred or so assembled artists keep their idiosyncracies as interpreters in the background; they know that the music states its case very well on its own, and they're content to let it do so. Five stars.

CJRT-FM to stay on the air

The Ontario government has apparently approved the establishment of a province-wide educational and cultural radio network. CJRT-FM and the Ryerson Open College will participate.

A victim of educational spending cutbacks, Ryerson's CJRT was given a reprieve last spring, and an Ontario government committee has decided to invest money to save the station and establish others of a broad cultural nature.

Committee member Margaret Schriener commented, "I'm just thrilled...We're starting a whole new kind of learning."

The Ryerson station's cost will rise to $360,000 in its fifth year of operation largely because of the Open College programming. The provincial government has agreed to pick up the Open Program tab, with business interests sponsoring the regular programming, consisting mainly of news and classical music.

A son loves, hates, and finds his father

Flowers don't smell of the fields lately, they smell of funeral parlours, says one of the characters in David French's new play after his wife's death. But the people of this play are as the flowers of the field, fragile, vulnerable and yet tenacious. They struggle for existence yet perceive the spectre of death which hovers over the most obstinate one of them.

Of The Fields, Lately begins with an introductory monologue spoken by Ben, the eldest son of the Mercer family. This is the family whom we first came to know through Leaving Home (which also premiered at the Tim Henry, Florence Paterson, Sean Sullivan in Of the Fields, Lately.

Tarragon) and in this return to them we are made aware of the changes and the sameness of their lives over a two year period. Ben has returned for his father's funeral and shares with us his feelings about their warring love/hate relationship which is resolved only in death. The son's thoughts are inter-cut with an antagonistic voice from the past — that of his father sitting in an armchair as Ben remembered him. The play then shifts back in time to Ben's first visit home after the stormy departure which ended Leaving Home.

Once again David French creates the incredible reality of these people as he isolates them in the home battleground and lays bare the emotional complexities of their relationships with each other. Pain can easily become self-indulgent suffering, love, syrupy sentiment, but just as this play hovers on soap opera the playwright changes the mood, injecting sudden comedy or anger which sweeps us away from sympathetic identification into a wider, more objective view. The focus centralizes around the understanding and reconciliation between father and son — as each in his own way leaves home for good.

The artistic integrity of the play begins of course with David French's solid construction of situation and emotional development. His language, more tightly precise and expressive than in Leaving Home, is capable of turning simple colloquial speech into poetry. But his work is strongly backed up by a perfect naturalistic set, which creates a real home for the Mercer family and by an excellent cast. Sean Sullivan as the father and Florence Paterson, the mother, give beautifully detailed and evocative performances. And as Ben begins his closing monologue, taking us away from the past back into the present, we are held spellbound by the simple truth and power of what he is saying. The final image is of the father who quietly folds his newspaper, rests back in his armchair and smiles. Although we shall always remember these people David French has told us all we need to know about them.

How a girl from the chorus ends up a star

In this day of almost excessive nostalgia, the world of satiric cliché seems to be extremely popular. So it is at the recent production of Dames at Sea in the intimate Theatre-in-the-Dell. Dames, a blatant yet very funny spoof on the 1930 Goldigger-theme is almost completely a cliché.

Ruby, a simple brown-haired 'girl, (who bears a strong resemblance to the thirties musical star of the same name), arrives on the bus from Centerville, Utah, prepared to make a hit on Broadway. All she carries is a pair of "tap shoes in her suitcase and a song in her heart". Ruby forgets her only and sacred possession on the bus, but it is returned to her by a sailor named Dick. A romance ensues between Ruby and the sailor, a yet undiscovered Cole Porter. This "Broadway Beethoven" who also resembles a 1930 musical hero — Dick Powell — soon becomes prey to the Star, Mona Kent.

Unfortunately the story is too soon fraught with disaster. Ruby believes Dick to have forsaken her for the vampish Mona. What's more, the theatre is to be torn down and turned into a roller rink on opening night. This change of events prompts the distraught Ruby to ask the overwhelming question: "Why has the sky turned dark so suddenly?"

However tragedy is soon transformed into joy. A battleship is secured for the show through Mona's connections with the captain she calls "Cupie-Doll". Shortly before the curtain is to rise Mona becomes ill and Ruby must take her place. "She goes out on the poop-deck a chorus girl and comes back a star." A simple wedding of all the characters brings the play to a fitting close.

This show could reek of sentimentality, ridicule, or both, as did the recent television production starring Ann Miller and Ann-Margaret. The latter, abundant with lavish dance scenes and sets, lacked both qualities of humour and vitality when compared to the small scale Dell production.

When at first confronted with a completely bare stage and a brick wall backdrop, one feels a slight sinking of the heart. However after Julie Amato as the sleek Mona Kent, fills the theatre with a powerful rendition of "That Mister Man of Mine", the sinking is replaced by a positive feeling, which grows through the simple yet inventive dance numbers and songs.

Charlene Shipp and Bob Ainslie fit their Keeler, Powell slots perfectly, sing well and dance passably, but are definitely overshadowed by the minor comic characters played by Angelo Ruffo and Deborah Packer.

Dames at Sea doesn't promise to change your way of thinking, but it is a pleasant evening's entertainment.

Rape and robbery is good clean fun

The difficulty in enjoying the two plays now on at the Backdoor Theatre lies in an uncomfortable sensation that one really shouldn't be enjoying them. They are at once pleasantly diverting and divertingly unpleasant.

This requires an explanation (but don't we all). The first of the evening is He Didn't Even Say Goodbye, an original one-act Canadian play by Norman Williams, in which a lamentable business man named Ben doesn't even say goodbye to those he dislikes. Rather disconcertingly they vanish from him. Ben is played as a stereotype of the heinous convention in theatre, (and in literature, in cinema, in television) that defines the sick man as a martyr to an obscure Social Force. But he is just sick, poor chap. Would that the mundane might be allowed to rest in peace. The play is a soap opera of the worst sort. But while the stouthearted wife and the rebellious son cry out for the accompaniment of a weeping organ, the drama still remains enjoyable — despite the hoary faults that a despoiser-of-soap-operas may discover.

It is perhaps possible now to see the dilemma of "To enjoy or not to enjoy": a small idea with unwarranted elaborations. He Didn't Even Say Goodbye is brought off quite humanly by a combination of honest production and acting.

Much the same might be and will be said of Night Freight, the Friday, October 5, 1973 second original one-act Canadian etcetera of the evening. Its writer, J. Michael Yates, has taken, as a Stratford Festival brochure might say, a man, a woman, an imaginary rapist-thief, and a deserted world, mixed those ingredients with a generous dose of devilish humour and grotesque actions, and (begad, hey, presto) produced an entertainment of no little merit.

The premise seems to be that things remain the same only if you allow it. Logically, the man and woman do not allow it, and most inventively work toward the moment when they may throw two invisible ears into the audience.

The play is a game, although a frightening game, which redeems its chaotic reversal of normal feeling.

Probably, we too would like to be raped, as is the woman, or robbed, as is the man, provided there were harmless excitement in such normally derogated pastimes; we too would delight in severing a head with no risk of punishment. Apparently, the vicariousness that saves the theatre from being laughable induces us to revel in this pleasant unpleasantness. We enjoy the unenjoyable.

That seems to be a comment, not for charm but for guile. Such is to be found at the Backdoor Theatre at 474 Ontario Street at 8:30 Tuesdays through Sundays. Et tu, Brute? Well then, thank you.

Rigoletto's a fitting climax

Right from the start, the new production of Rigoletto at O'Keefe Centre is overpowering and brilliant. Most directors would be content to leave the curtain down during the prelude, bringing it up on the jovial crowd at the Duke's palace. But director Peter Symcox has seen fit to do it differently; after only a few bars the curtain rises on the scene, but there's no action. The Duke, the courtiers, the ladies of the court are all frozen, giving the stage the appearance of a costumed sculpture gallery. Then, from the foot of the Duke's throne, Rigoletto the jester rises.

He's not the bubbling, happy clown, though—instead of a broad grin, he's wearing a bitter frown. As the prelude draws to an end, he raises his stick-clown, and brings it slowly down, like a magic wand. Suddenly, the lights come up, the action ensues, and the familiar story is on its way once again.

There's no way to convey the tremendous power of this image. Like the opening of the film Cabaret, where the camera pans over the reflection of the crowd in the mirror and finally comes to rest on the leering face of the MC, Rigoletto's silent display of his anger and bitterness is a fierce laying open of the essence of the plot.

From then on, the opera is a show of scene after scene of brilliant singing, and (just as important) credible and believable acting. The casting of this production was done with obvious care and skill, because all the principals look their parts. Ruggero Bondi as the libertine Duke appears noble and handsome, and has a glorious high end of his tenor voice, which makes his big arias (La Donna e Mobile, in particular) thrilling.

As Gilda, the jester's daughter, Maria Pellegrini was superb. "Caro Nome", her aria in the second act, was sung with the agility and solidity that would do justice to any performance, but in this one it was simply another jewel in the crown, to coin a cliché. The aria has everything from top C's to trills and all sorts of coloratura leaps, and Ms. Pellegrini brought them off with an élan that a Sutherland or Nilsson would be happy to have. In the rest of the performance, she was nothing short of brilliant.

There could be no Rigoletto without a baritone to take the title role, though. There were times when Louis Quilico simply outshone everything and everyone on the stage, despite the fact that the production, from scenery to costumes to chorus is excellent. Quilico's Rigoletto has always been good, but the degree of acting that went into his performance made his superb singing all the more effective. At the end of the second act, when the jester realizes that he's just helped the cowardly kidnaper his own daughter and that the curse of Count Monterone must be working, Quilico winds into the final line ("Ah... la Maledizione") with the impact of a sledgehammer.

I could go on rhapsodizing about this production for hours, but the most important thing I can say about it is run to get tickets for the three remaining performances (tomorrow matinee, Monday and Thursday evening). The performance I saw was sold out, and there aren't many tickets left, but don't pass it up.

Even if you're not an opera fan on a big scale, do yourself a treat and go see this show. From the opening scene at the Duke's palace to the final tableau outside the assassin's house, this production is believable, expertly sung and exciting. Ten stars for this one — it succeeds in doing what the production of Gottterdammerung couldn't do: It's a fitting climax to twenty-five years of the Canadian Opera Company.

Dash and flair justify re-run

Beethoven: Five Piano Concertos
Vladimir Ashkenazy, piano
Chicago Symphony
London (4 discs)

The Georg Solti juggernaut roars along, and with every new release from London Records it looks more and more likely that he'll record the complete works of every composer from Beethoven to Bartok, and then some, before he's finished. Another formidable holding in the London roster is the pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy, who makes a career of playing to sold-out houses all over the world, including Toronto.

Together, these two (with the not inconsiderable skills of Solti's Chicago Symphony Orchestra) have taken on the task of recording all of Beethoven's Piano Concertos, which must be the umpteenth time these works have hit the vinyl. As always, the question has to be asked: are the performers saying anything that hasn't been said before? Is this recording really necessary?

A quick glance through the Schwann catalogue shows that two of the eleven available complete sets are put out by London, so why are they issuing another? These questions are neatly forgotten once a chance to hear the records has been had. Ashkenazy, with his massive technical skill at the ready, brings to the concertos a sense of dash and flair that do justice to what Beethoven wrote. At the same time, he has lyrical feeling to spare for the more contemplative moments which abound in the slow movements.

Solti's presence is great on these recordings, an approach which is quite unlike that of some conductors, who try to remain inconspicuous in what they consider to be a soloist's showcase. Well, showcase it is, but Solti knows well that the orchestra's part is more than mere accompaniment in Beethoven's concertos. A style of conduction that would suit itself to Chopin or Schumann would be distinctly out of place here.

As an example, the opening of the fourth concerto (where the piano begins unaccompanied) is handled in a manner smooth as silk, with the orchestra just creeping in on the edge of audibility after the soloist's initial statement. Throughout the first movement, Solti handles the musical forces with a sure touch, using rubato and dramatic changes in volume to achieve maximum effect.

Now this certainly isn't to everybody's taste, and there are many who do not consider Solti the ideal conductor. Ignoring for the moment his worth as an ideal, his style is quite to my taste, and the taste of many others. Much more important, his musical outlook seems to be regarded with respect and sympathy by Vladimir Ashkenazy, and it's this quite audible rapport which makes the records really come off well. The Emperor Concerto (No. 5), which has been played into the ground, sounds fresh in the hands of these musicians, particularly the rondo movement.

The cadenzas are Ashkenazy's choice, and are played with consummate skill, although a couple weren't very familiar. When will record companies start putting the cadenza composers right on the label, or at least on the jacket of the record?

Part of the credit for the set's excellent polish must go to Decca's (London's British name) recording engineers, who mastered these sessions in England. The orchestra and piano are held in balance (although with today's techniques this is expected), but the outstanding point is the marvellous recorded sound the piano gets. Very natural and unbrassy for a change. The pressings are imported from Britain, and keep up London's reputation for spotlessly clean masters. London's own Canadian pressings could take a point or two from these discs, although it's only fair to say that nearly all of the classical product in the London catalogue is imported.

Beethoven's concertos are part of the basic repertoire, and should form the basis, along with his symphonies, of a good collection. For once, then, we have a record with a full-price tag that's worth every penny of it.

John Hammond's not-alone solo

Triumvirate
John Hammond, Dr. John, Mike Bloomfield
Columbia; $6.29

'Columbia really fucked me over on this record.' John Hammond was talking to me about his latest "solo" album on Columbia Records, Triumvirate.

Hammond and the other musicians involved were under the impression that they were recording a John Hammond album. It wasn't until the product was released that they found out about the "triumvirate" concept. Columbia had given equal billing to Dr. John, and guitarist Mike Bloomfield, as well as Hammond. (with the money to be split three ways).

Both Hammond and Dr. John have expressed their dissatisfaction at Columbia's underhandedness. The record company was using Dr. John's name and picture on the front cover, to generate album sales. (Dr. John had a popular single and album in the last 2 months). The public has also been misled into believing a new "supergroup" had been formed.

John Hammond (Jr.) knows the recording industry. The son of John Hammond Sr., the eminent Columbia record producer (whose discoveries have included Bob Dylan, Aretha Franklin and Leonard Cohen), Hammond (Jr.) was brought up in a musical environment that stressed the blues and jazz. Hammond became one of the better harp players and acoustic interpreters of the blues, and made a number of recordings on the Vanguard label during the sixties. He's also the man responsible for finding The Band in Toronto and introducing them to Dylan.

Triumvirate is a collection of blues, r&b and "Dr. John-style" tunes, hand picked by Hammond. Dr. John handled the arrangements and played keyboards, Bloomfield added lead guitar, and Hammond took care of vocals, guitar and harmonica.

There is obvious Dr. John influence in the piano work and even in the Allen Toussaint flavoured horn arrangements. It did take a few listenings before I found Hammond's voice comfortable in songs which I felt were more suited to Dr. John. Hammond's vocal power really comes through in the slow blues material like "Last Night", "Just To Be With You" and "It Hurts Me Too".

Bloomfield's guitar lines are always adequate but never deserving of special merit. The arrangements vary from too little to too much. The vocals on John Lee Hooker's "Ground Hog Blues" sound too much like Hooker. Then there's Willie Dixon's "Pretty Thing". It's been transformed into an awkward Mardi Gras style Song.

Most tunes, though, should keep up your interest quotient. That's especially true of a song like "Baby Let Me Kiss You" with its driving beat, stimulating horn line, syncopation and the walling female chorus.

Here's hopping Columbia lets well enough alone next time. Maybe they'll even let John Hammond record the acoustic blues that he usually performs — if they don't think it'll hurt his sales.

Doobies, Denver slip by boppers

Over the past five years, record companies have been channelling more and more of their resources into long-playing records. The result: music marts are being flooded by the $5-and-up discs.

Anyone with an eye to economy who wants to delve into a representative selection of current rock favourites has to be pretty cautious when he wanders past the (sometimes false) security of the Top Ten. A lot of the better albums, artistically speaking, won't show up on that chimerical rating system—one reason being the seemingly unlimited resources of the 14-year-old set. Their clamouring for the copies of Donny's latest, or a newie from Grand Funk or Deep Purple, tends to outweigh the merits of your personal picks, which slumber in relative obscurity.

The Doobie Brothers, for instance, have only recently made a charge into the Osmond country of hit albums.

Their second collection of bayou music with a difference The Captain and Me (Warner Bros.—WEA) is chuck full of the type of crisply-rendered, toe-curling harmonies that made "Long Train Runnin'" such a justified recent hit; it also contains their follow-up outing, "China Grove".

Perhaps fans of the now-defunct Harpers Bizarre will be quick to point out that the Doobies' producer is former Harpers-mainstay Ted Templeman, but in any event the Doobie Brothers added the welcome dimension of sophisticated harmonies to their up-tempo tunes.

One album you won't find on many best-seller charts is an unpretentious release by Gallagher and Lyle, late of McGuinness-Flint, entitled Willie And The Lap Dog (A&M). These two west-Scots have an uncanny ability to pen the type of soft lyrical McCartney-esque ballads reminiscent of "Blackbird". They infuse them with an touch of their own magic, as in "Hotel Constantine", an almost dead-ringer for a double-tracked Paul, if it weren't for the distinctive Scots accents. Produced by Glyn Johns, the twelve songs of Gallagher and Lyle have a quiet innocence about them, even when the basic guitar tracks are augmented by a full symphony orchestra, as on "Thoughts From A Station".

John Denver is beginning to get some of the national exposure which he rightly deserves. But let's hope that his guest-stints on panel and talk shows and his TV drama work won't take him too far afield of what he does best. His clear tenor voice which carried the Mitchell Trio through its waning years, has the quality to embrace an album full of pop-folk tunes.

Denver's "I'd Rather Be A Cowboy" is one of the premier cuts on his latest release Farwell Andromeda (RCA). "Cowboy" is the lament of a dislocated guy, who's tired of traversing the freeways of California, who figures he'd rather straddle a horse than a white line. Denver has worked a John Prine song into each of his past two albums. He does it again with an excellent job on "Angels From Montgomery", as well as an equally admirable treatment of Hoyt Axton's "Sweet Misery". Eleven good ones from this Colorado Lightfoot.

theatre

After a proliferation of new openings in the past couple of weeks, there is a temporary breathing space for you to catch up on Watsup. Take advantage of the time because by the middle of October so much else will be happening that you'll have to miss a few choice shows. For instance AC/DC, playing at the New Theatre in the Bathurst United Church, is an important work. It bombards with an electronic, high frequency language as aggressive as the media it assaults. Also David French's Of The Fields, Lately, which premiered at the Tarragon last Saturday, is not to be missed. A follow-up work to Leaving Home, it draws incredible poetic expression from the same working class environment. More on that in the review section. As always there are several first-time productions. Une Tempête, Le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur's radical re-working of Shakespeare's play, opened on October 2nd, and an original cabaret show called The Group of Seven and The Case of the Glowing Pine premiered yesterday at the Poor Alex. Structured on a series of comic sketches and mini-epics, it takes for its themes "D-Day, Law and Order, The Undeclared Border and, Other Childhood Legends". Coming up next week on October 11th, is Leaven of Malice, the first play of the Hart House Theatre season. $3

movies

By the end of this week there will be four Canadian features showing at first-run theatres in town. Even taking into account that this week the Canadian Film Awards will be announced, that is quite an occurrence. We haven't seen any of the films, but they are The Pyx, which has gotten good reviews and looks from the ads vaguely Kluge-ish; Kamouraska opening at Cinecity (Claude Jutra's first since Mon Oncle Antoine, the best Canadian movie ever); Don Shebib's tale of friendship and bank-robbery, Between Friends, at the Imperial Six; and, opening on Wednesday, with the stars present and all that sort of hoopla is Peter Pearson's film of love on the prairies these days, Paperback Hero. The movie has been breaking records in Saskatchewan. Wednesday's premiere is open to the public and followed by a party at the Old Bavaria, also open to the public. Admission the usual $3, at the New Yorker, which seems to have abandoned its porno policy.

Evidently the Revue's admission is $1.75, not $1.50, but it still shows good movies. Starting Sunday is a week of Ken Loach films. Loach is a natural-lighting, real people sort of director, but a very good one. Kes, running Sunday to Tuesday is a beautiful little piece about a Yorkshire boy (working class, of course; there is I think only one class in Yorkshire) and his hawk. It is very like The 400 Blows, though in no way copied from it, and it may very well be as good. Unfortunately it is in Yorkshire dialect (An Ilkly Moor ba 'ta), but then the words are not that important when the tune is so good. Wednesday through Saturday, Kes is replaced by Family Life, or as it was badly titled for the North American market, Wednesday's Child. The movie is not as tight as Kes, but it has the advantage of R.D. Laing as a de facto script researcher. The film is essentially a composite case from Laing's Divided Self. It has its flaws and cop-outs, and, in this one, the professional members of the cast fare much better than the amateurs, but it is compelling stuff none-the-less. If you are unread in Laing's (or Bateson, Cooper or Goffman's) myth shattering work about mental illness, Loach provides an easy entry.

Unfortunately The Harder They Come, a gritty Jamaican film with a misleading title has left CinémaLumière before we could get around to it. We'll recommend it when it next turns up. Film premiere of the year: Rochdale showed a bootleg print of Deep Throat with a ten dollar admission but with a nine dollar discount for everyone coming naked. Unfortunately we had another engagement. bb

Author tries to grasp the nature of subversive art

The Absolute Bourgeois - Artists and Politics in France 1848-1852
by T.J. Clark
Thames and Hudson

This is the first of two books by the author examining the art and lives of the first definitively political artists. The Absolute Bourgeois deals extensively with three artists: Jean-Francois Millet, Honoré Daumier and Eugene Delacroix, and its sequel deals exclusively with the first bona-fide revolutionary artist, Gustave Courbet. Stating that art history and general history cannot be separated, Clark introduces the book by giving the social and political background in France to the two revolutions of 1848: the "beautiful" February revolution, when "employer and employee embraced on the barricades," and the disillusioning "ugly" revolution of June. He examines the various responses to them and attempts to distinguish characteristic art of each.

February was a bourgeois, republican revolution, with the workers fighting for their employers, as Clark says, "like serfs fighting for their lords". Although the omen of their own destruction was implicit in this theatrical revolution (there was no effective resistance to it) it was universally welcomed by the bourgeoisie. Most of the art anticipating the February revolution and acclaiming its arrival was in the formal tradition of "rhetorical art" - art framing a doctrine. The seeds of a break with this tradition, however, were already existent. Clark cites Delacroix' "Liberty Guiding the People" (everyone's seen it) as presaging the truly political art of June.

The painting allegory is conventional enough: a luminescent, bare breasted Liberty leading student, capitalist and worker to battle. It parted from tradition on another count. It was based on a well-known incident from the 1830 revolution, located at a particular street corner, and its heroine modelled on an authentic Parisian Amazon. Despite this historical certainty, however its workers were stereotypes: faces stamped with the traditional anonymity of workers and fading in the mist. Delacroix was the son of new, Napoleonic money and a small estate owner. He was enthusiastic in 1830, and in February '48, but turned sullen and reactionary after the June days, turning exclusively to Biblical and Oriental subjects. His sympathies were with the bourgeoisie and the first truly political artists were to identify with the workers or the peasants.

The thesis one gleans from The Absolute Bourgeois is an intriguing one but, unfortunately, often lost sight of. Truly political art, Clark argues, opposed to mechanical "rhetorical" art, is grounded in the artist's immediate sensuous apprehension of reality, and this sensuous apprehension, he claims, is greatly affected by political experience and belief. This truly political art (he also speaks of "revolutionary art") is subversive by its very nature and usually unacceptable to the political part whose doctrine it would appear to support. All parties and governments want art that pays tribute to their rank and file and their leaders and inveighs against their opposition.

Millet and Daumier by Clark's definition were truly political and subversive artists. Both used more or less conventional motifs to paint political paintings.

Millet, although the son of fairly prosperous farmer and recipient of a traditional art education, knew and identified with the peasants. He had a peasant's understanding of the nature of farm labor, its brutality and meaninglessness. Bringing this to bear on traditionally quaint bucolic subject matter, he effectively subverted the motif. Because he violated artistic decorum only half way and so subtly (Courbet went all the way) it was years before his work really started to jar critics. Clark's discussion of the representation of work in Millet's "The Sower" is both impressive and accurate. Work is not represented as a "process which changes or shapes the surrounding world, not a matter of making or assertion. It is a series of actions endlessly repeated, a spell, an incantation, magic which the magician does not expect to work. It is a gesture once learned, now automatic; a task which subdues the performer, lulling her to sleep, turning him grim-faced and brutish; a complex of wheels in which one is crushed."

Daumier, son of a dispossessed and obsolete artisan, knew the Parisian proletariat and bourgeoisie as well as Millet knew his peasants. He communicated this first-hand knowledge of each, and independence of both, in his art. Essentially a leftist political cartoonist, operating on the frontier of art, he represented the bourgeois not as monstrous and grotesque but as recognizably petty, frightened, and foolish. He removed the workers from the haze—portrayed them as menacing and impatient, as thinking individuals rather than as a mob. Mostly a caricaturist, he also did some paintings, one entitled "The Republic". Whereas Delacroix conveyed his "Liberty" off a coin or stamp and placed her on a Parisian street corner, Daumier represented his "Republic" against the most conventional background—seated imposingly on an angular granite throne, nursing two hungry little boys—out gave her the face of a Parisian prostitute. Courbet and Manet would soon go farther.

By examining these three artists, Clark has gone a long way towards redefining the nature of truly political and subversive art. However, he doesn't make much headway on the larger questions of the relationship of politics and art in general, on public versus private art, and the commercial laws of art, all of which he brings up. Hopefully he'll do so in the sequel.

John Mayall, who could be termed the father of British blues will be at Convocation Hall on Sunday. Mayall has investigated almost every form of the blues, starting off in the electric-rock style then moving to an acoustic-folk sound before settling into his current jazz influenced phase. Tickets for the two shows at 6 and 10 pm, are $5 and are available from the SAC office.

Dr. John, riding high on the popularity of "In The Right Place" comes to Massey Hall for a concert at 8 pm on Sunday. Tickets are $3.85 to $6.05.

Bonnie Raitt who plays a mean slide guitar and has a voice that's perfect for the blues she sings, headlines a concert at Convocation Hall next Friday, with Leon Redbone. Redbone is an elusive, mysterious bluesman who's admired by almost every musician who has seen him. Tickets to the concert are available in Hart House for a special student price of $3.50.

Amazing Grace, a Toronto group, entertain at Fiddler's Green tonight, with American traditional folk music. Call 489-3001 for more information.

Willie Dixon, composer of such blues-rock standards as "Spoonful", "Little Red Rooster", "Seventh Son" and "Hochie Coochie Man", is at The El Macambo, on Spadina below College tonight and tomorrow. It could be expensive. am

There's still plenty of opera to be seen before this year's season winds up. Tonight the Merry Widow holds forth, while tomorrow Rigoletto is the matinee, and Fidelio the evening presentation. Monday's show is Rigoletto, Tuesday's is the Barber of Seville, Fidelio gets freed from prison again on Wednesday, and the last performance of Rigoletto, starring the excellent Louis Quilico, is on Thursday. As always, try to get your tickets well in advance, especially for the Merry Widow, which seems to attract huge standing-room crowds. All performances at 8:15 sharp, at O'Keefe Centre, Front and Yonge Sts., prices $4.50 to an outrageous $11.00.

An interesting series of opera films is being presented by the German-Canadian Council of the Arts at the Town Hall (St. Lawrence Centre) this week. Filmed at the Hamburg State Opera, The Marriage of Figaro and The Tsar and the Carpenter will be shown Sunday through Tuesday, at $2.25 per film (reserved seats). This provides a good, cheap alternative to the Canadian Opera, as well as being a comparison piece for our own production of the Barber.

As usual, CBC pours forth a cornucopia of classical creativity this week. Sunday morning at 10:30 sees the beginning of a new 13-week series of programs entitled Rachmaninoff in Perspective, which should be of interest in this, the composer's centenary year.

For fans of the Royal Albert Hall, the 12:05 PM "BBC Concert" show presents the Promenade Concerts, which feature Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance Marches. Hum along now, "Land of hope and glory..." db

Police harass workers

By TIM GALLAGHER
Strike breaking efforts by police continue to plague picketers at the two Artistic Woodwork plants in northwestern Toronto.
Yesterday morning, at the Densley St. plant, police kicked and shoved their way through a wall of picketers who were blocking the entrance to the plant. Several picketers were thrown to the ground by one officer who, later on for no visible reason, arrested a picketer for "common assault". This brings the total number of arrests to over 50.
A number of the 50 picketers were manhandled by about twenty-five police officers. Several female picketers complained of being pinched and grabbed by police who repeatedly tried to disperse the picket line.
Picketers, determined to win their demands, stood fast while chanting at police: Serve the bosses, protect the scabs. One picket spokesman exclaimed that "When the bosses unite workers from all over must get together to win."
He was referring to Douglas Aircraft workers who last week were arrested by police, and later suspended or fired from their jobs for supporting the strike at Artistic Woodwork. The "bosses" at Douglas Aircraft have indicated that they have no desire for their workers to support someone else's strike. In fact, it was reported by picketers that the Douglas management has videotaped television news coverage of the strike in an attempt to identify any of its workers on the Artistic Woodwork picket line.

Already, five members of the UAW's bargaining committee have been fired from their jobs at Douglas Aircraft and the union's nine-man executive has been suspended after mass absenteeism protesting earlier suspensions. These earlier suspensions were a direct consequence of support by Douglas Aircraft workers for the strike at Artistic Woodwork.
Despite increased harassment from management and police, the strikers at Artistic Woodwork are continuing to picket with support of students and other workers.
Artistic Woodwork employees, who are mainly immigrants, walked out in late August when management refused to negotiate with their bargaining agent the Canadian Textile and Chemical Union about job security and labour-management relations.

Survival group meets

By DAVID SIMMONDS
The "Draft Canadian Plan for Survival" was launched on Wednesday at a press conference held at Hart House.
The document, according to its authors, several of whom are U of T faculty members, "represents the initiative of a group of concerned Canadians towards the survival of life on this planet".
The plan was conceived by the "Survival Institute of Canada", a group set up following the UN conference on the human environment, held in June, 1972, at Stockholm. The institute then organized the "Group of 50", which met last May at Glendon College to draft the survival plan. Several members of the Group of 50 are U of T faculty.
Vernon Heaslip, founder of the institute, stressed at the press conference that the document was not a final plan for survival, but rather a continuing plan.
Chris Taylor, a member of the Group of 50, and a teaching assistant at U of T, stated that the intent of the plan was not so much to push government as it was to "consolidate the concerns of Canadians. Government is shackled until public opinion is ready for change", Taylor said.
True Davidson, a member of the Group of 50, and lately columnist in the Toronto Sun, added that the public was "ready and indeed hungry" for the plan.
The Survival Institute is planning to hold a series of public hearings this month, from October 17-20. It is encouraging people to submit written responses to the plan, and to make oral presentations at the hearings.

Following that, the institute hopes to form local chapters, which will become "focal points for local implementation of steps to move us toward our goal."
Funding for the institute has so far come from the pockets of its members and from Rotary International. In fact Rotary International president, William Carter, called "Rotary's man of destiny" by Heaslip, is a staunch advocate of the survival plan. Several members of the institute belong to a local chapter of the Rotarians. Heaslip in addition to being a Rotarian, is also a high rise developer through Belmont Construction Co.
In the future, the institute hopes to survive on the basis of yearly membership fees from members of the public who join the institute.
Heaslip stressed that although the plan was Canadian in origin, it was not meant to be limited solely to Canada, although Canada had first priority. Davidson declared that the institute did not have a "parochial approach".
Heaslip also suggested that the government was not unaware of the plan. He said that he expected it to be discussed at a meeting of Ontario's resource ministers, held yesterday.

Vaughan says U of T responsible for parking

Ward 10 alderman Colin Vaughan demanded Wednesday that university administrators take responsibility for the chaotic parking problems in the Annex, which will result when thousands of spectators flock to see Toronto's second hockey team, the Toronto Toros, play at Varsity Arena.

"Certain people have a responsibility to the surrounding community, and must address themselves to the problem, not shift it off on the city," he told the city-U of T Liaison Committee, a group of university and community representatives, and aldermen meeting at City Hall.

To ensure the university protects the area from the influx of cars, Vaughan proposed setting up a subcommittee that would include U of T president John Evans, business affairs vice president Alex Rankin, Internal Affairs vice president Jill Conway, Toros entrepreneur, John Basset Jr., and police commissioner Judge C.O. Bick.

This subcommittee, according to Vaughan's motion, would establish a parking complaints bureau, which people could contact when their driveways were blocked, their lawns parked on, or their cars walled in by intruding vehicles. This bureau, he said, should be widely publicized.

He further suggested that the home phone numbers of the committee members should at the same time be made public so irate local residents could phone and let them "know what the problem is."

Vaughan also stressed that the subcommittee should encourage the use of public transportation to the games or open the university to parking during these events.

President Evans, who was co-chairing the meeting with Ward 6 Alderman William Archer, suggested that perhaps Vaughan should also be a member of the committee because of his "creativity in terms of ideas."

He added that "not one person had raised any objection" when the university first brought up the matter of a Toros' deal at the last liaison committee meeting in May.

Rankin, who was present at the committee meeting, said that the Toros were going to highlight public transportation, and sell parking spaces and tickets together.

He pointed to a map, saying that some areas "have been cleared, manned, and made ready." However, he promised to "follow the Toros up" to see if in fact they were doing what they promised.

The university was making about 500 parking spaces available for use by Toros spectators. Varsity stadium's capacity audience is 4,700 people.

A compromise subcommittee was finally agreed upon, however, and it was approved at the meeting that Evans, Basset, Vaughan and Police Commissioner Bick would serve. Conway and Rankin were spared.

The chairman of Governing Council's External Affairs Committee, Ian Tate, was "a little dismayed that senior people would have their own private home numbers available to public use". This part of Vaughan's original motion was also deleted.

Parking problems were not the only complaints brought forward at the liaison committee, when it came to the U of T deal last summer with the Toros. Although there is no question of stopping the Toros from playing, a student representative on the committee, SAC vice president Steve Moses, suggested that the "U of T had some obligation to amateur sports in the surrounding community," and should make facilities available in the best possible way to the community.

The only rationale the university had in its decision was to make some money to plow back into athletic facilities. However, Moses observed that plans for a new athletic building that have since been scrapped because of the provincial freeze on capital spending estimated the cost at $6,000,000, and the $100,000 that the university will get from the rental of the arena to the Toros was less than 2 per cent of that amount.

Ward 6 alderman Dan Heap inquired whether students participated in the decision to bring the Toros to the U of T, since student fees and rentals were largely responsible for the facilities.

Rankin pointed out that they did participate through the athletic directorate. The directorate has 21 members, seven of which are students. One member is selected by SAC, and six are selected by the Varsity Blues, or coaches, according to Steve Moses. Students in intramural sports were not involved on the directorate, he said.

At Moses' recommendation, a committee was set up to meet with representatives of the U of T Internal Affairs Committee and review the shared use of various existing and planned recreational and athletic facilities.

US funds keep Vietnam police working hard

WASHINGTON, DC - (CUP - LNS) US support to South Vietnam's police and prison systems is now covert, but has increased since the peace agreement prohibiting such support was signed.

When separate conduit accounts are added up, it turns out that the Nixon Administration will spend $20 million on South Vietnam's police in the current fiscal year, a 50 per cent increase over last year.

The United States has been subsidizing the South Vietnamese police force since 1954. Last year alone, the US Agency for International Development (USAID) public safety program spent $13.6 million to expand South Vietnam's pris-system, to convert the Vietnamese National Police into a tough paramilitary force, and to furnish 200 US police advisors.

Under the peace agreement signed last January, the United States pledged to remove all military and paramilitary advisors from Vietnam within 60 days and to cease its involvement in that country's internal political affairs. Clearly, these provisions required the termination of the public safety program.

Several weeks after the agreement was signed, the state department announced that USAID had terminated its assistance to the national police.

But several US senators have subsequently discovered that the old activities are being continued under different names.

Senator Edward Kennedy, who investigated the AID situation last June, reported in a senate speech that "public safety" is now called "technical support", "public administration" and "public works".

Kennedy cited millions of dollars going to the South Vietnamese police under new headings and charged that the administration had instituted a "covert program".

One apparent aim of this aid is to continue "Operation Phoenix," a CIA-led effort to "neutralize" the National Liberation Front (NLF) underground in South Vietnam.

Thieu made additional use of the program to liquidate his opposition among Buddhists, students and other non-Communist groups. As of May 1972, when the Pentagon stopped supplying figures, 27,000 political activists had been killed by Phoenix operatives. An estimated 200,000 political prisoners are still being held without trial.

Computer systems used in the Phoenix program were set up under the CORD (Civil Operations and Rural Development) program. The training of Saigon police technicians in "Computer System Management" will enable them to take over the operation of CORD data banks holding political information on some 12 million South Vietnamese citizens.

With the administration under pressure to withdraw the thousands of US military technicians still remaining in South Vietnam, it has become necessary to rush the training of Vietnamese technicians to operate the vast police computer facilities. This delicate task is being performed by a Los Angeles based firm, the Computer Sciences Corporation (CSC), under a multi-million dollar contract with the department of defence.

CSC maintains an office in Saigon staffed by 56 American computer specialists. Presumably, this staff includes some ex-Operation Phoenix advisors formerly on the CORD payroll. A CSC advertisement in the Saigon Port of March 24, 1973 specified: "Data reduction clerk — position available immediately for one American Secret clearance required. Prefer applicant with previous Vietnam experience."

In a telephone interview with this correspondent, spokesmen for the CSC refused to provide details on its Vietnam work. The company later told Time Magazine that "we have no knowledge of what (the South Vietnamese) are doing with the technical training we are giving them."

Senator Kennedy and other legislators maintain that there is little mystery about what the South Vietnamese police are doing.

Says Senator Alan Cranston (D, Calif.): "AID is continuing to bolster a cruel and repressive police apparatus in South Vietnam."

Olympic reform?

The 10th Olympic Congress wound up yesterday with some half-hearted attempts at reform. The Congress was the first of its kind in 43 years.

One of the main topics of the Congress was a new eligibility code for Olympic athletes.

Rule 26, among other things, forbids an Olympic athlete from participating in his sport more than 30 days annually and forbids the acceptance of money, other than pocket money, for his participation.

Soccer Blues hand Western first loss, 2-0

By JOHN COBBY

The Soccer Blues won their third consecutive game yesterday, this time victimizing the Western Mustangs. The 2-0 victory puts the Blues back into contention, as the Mustangs brought an unbeaten record with them to Varsity Stadium. Both Blues and Mustangs are tied, trailing Laurentian Voyageurs.

Initially the play was all in Western's favor as Blues, with Herb Dubsky playing at left back in place of the injured Bob Cazzola, showed a lack of understanding in defence. However, goalkeeper Bob Judd was in fine form and, in quick succession, dove bravely at the feet of two Mustang forwards as they tried to force the bouncing ball into the goal.

The individual effort inspired the Toronto team, who began to settle into a more organized game. As Iain Slimmon, Geoff Crewe, and Dubsky took control of their opponents the Blues spent less time chasing the ball and hence had more opportunity to build attacks. They did this by sweeping the ball across the field to draw the defence out of position and then, with that mission accomplished, exploited the resulting gaps with penetrating through balls.

Gradually the pressure on the visitor's defence led to a succession of corner kicks for the Blues. From one of these, taken on the right by Peter Hillier, Toronto opened their account after 20 minutes.

Crewe, using his height to good effect in the penalty area, won the ball in the air from among a group of defenders. His glancing header fell to Allen Caramancio who slipped the ball along the ground to his left where Vince Ierullo was waiting; he hit a first-time shot past the diving Glen Krelowe in the Mustang's goal.

Western were dismayed, but not disheartened, and, led by Victor Jonz in midfield, they fought back with intelligent passing. Blues, however, buoyed by their goal, were able to raise their game to meet the challenge as Tim Burns and Carmen Marcantonio demonstrated their midfield skills by nullifying the Mustang advances before they became too dangerous.

With increasing frequency Blues used the overlapping defender to advantage. Hillier, in particular, passed the ball across the field to either Slimmon on the right or John Cobby on the left for these players, moving forward from deep in defence, to carry the ball outside the Mustang defenders, whose attentions were riveted on the Blues' attackers. One run by Slimmon concluded with a high cross which Marcantonio ran onto only to see his powerful header hit the crossbar. The ball rebounded straight to Caramancio, who had the simple task of propelling it a few yards into goal.

The weather changed at the half from clear to a persistent rain. Whether it was the weather or the move of Jonz to the visitor's attack, the Blues were unable to continue the competent play displayed before the break. Whereas previously passes would be hit with accuracy and collected with ease, now they lacked pace or direction, and control of the ball became haphazard.

The Toronto defence became obliged to apply itself diligently to the task of preventing a Mustang goal and possible comeback. On occasions the organization of the defence appeared faulty, but, in general, there was always a spare defender on hand to cover for a colleague who had missed his tackle or been drawn out of position.

As often happens, the team under pressure had the best scoring chances. With the Mustang right back Jim Kolman dedicated to an offensive cause, Vito Polera was often left unmarked. Twice he failed to convert clear chances, once when put in the clear by Marcantonio and once by his own efforts.

Eventually a stalemate resulted with the Mustang's midfield dominance thwarted by an uncompromising Blues' rearguard. Only on one occasion was there a severe threat to the Blues' goal; the result of a quickly-taken indirect free kick some 20 yards out. Western cleverly worked the ball past the Toronto defensive wall, but Judd was alert to the danger and smothered the attempted shot before it could be fully completed.

The win was satisfying to coach Bob Nicol, who pronounced himself satisfied with the application of the defence under the most severe pressure they have faced this year. However, he expressed concern over the midfield slackness displayed in the second half.

Blues' Vito Polera (number 11) fires one of several tries into the hands of goalkeeper Glen Krelowe. Toronto shut out Western Mustangs 2-0 on a rain-soaked pitch to keep their play-off hopes alive.

If the Blues, who travel to meet unbeaten Laurentian Voyageurs twice over the weekend, are to return doubly victorious from Sudbury, they cannot concede control of the midfield for half of the game. Should the Blues win on both Saturday and Sunday, they will regain last year's league-leading position.

Free kicks...Bob Cazzola is out for at least two weeks with suspected cartilage damage in his left knee...Ian Harris, who injured his groin in the pre-season play, may start training again in the near future.

Rugby first XV loses, seconds win at York

By JAMES MacDONALD
and JOHN DRUMMOND

The Rugby Blues suffered their first defeat of the season, losing 19-3 to York University at York on Wednesday afternoon.

The game was closely contested on the ground, but it was through the air with penalty kicks and probing punts from fly-half and centres that York dominated. York kicker Mario Raponi managed four penalty goals to account for 12 of York's points in a game that was punctuated by endless interruptions for major and minor infractions. The game was very much a repetition of last year's first game with York. That ended in a 15-3 win for the Yeomen as Raponi accounted for all York's points on penalties.

The first half began with York kicking off to the Blues. The opening minutes set the tone of the game as ever-officious referee Ian Muir interrupted play excessively by his overly stringent application of the rules of rugby. Raponi missed 4 early kicks for goal but with his fifth attempt put York ahead 3-0. The unkindest cut came during a ruck after the ensuing kick-off. Toronto's number 8, Mike Code, received a deep gash over his temple and was forced to quit the game. With Code went the most potent part of the Blue's cross coverage and their capability to disrupt York's back movements.

Moments later the Yeomen's captain Everett Spencer dropped a goal from 35 yards to increase the lead to 6-0.

Just prior to the half, after a period of see-saw play, York's full-back came between the centre to score the game's only try. At the half it was York by 10-0.

The second half saw much of the same indecisive play in the mid-field area, punctuated by penalty goals, three by Raponi and one by the Blue's Bruce Carroll.

The first XV's league record now stands at 2-1-0, with five games to go, including four home games.

The Blue's second XV had more luck as they defeated York 9-3 in a scrappy game filled with rough play and cheap shots from both teams.

The Yeomen kicked the ball to the Blues to start the game and immediately began to pressure the U of T team. Several times York approached the goal-line but were denied any points by a combination of tough defensive play and penalties. Mid-way through the half, however, the Yeomen were awarded a penalty 25 yards out which they proceeded to make good for three points.

After this the Blues appeared to put a bit more into their game and began to penetrate York's end. Tremendous punting, which appears to be a York trade-mark, and superiority in the line-out saved the Yeomen a number of times. Eventually the Blues were given a penalty kick 25 yards out which winger Chris Bouris drop-kicked for the tying three points. This ended the half and both teams took a break.

The second half was on the whole dominated by the Blues, yet they were unable to score a try again because of fine York kicking as well as hesitation to pick up the ball in the loose and run with it. The Toronto forwards, while showing better technique in the set scrums, were usually beaten in the loose rucks, perhaps due to their smaller size.

About a third of the way through the half frustration began to show as players started to throw punches as well as other sorts of action which can so easily destroy a good game of rugby. The Blues were awarded a number of penalty kicks in York's half but as the backs seemed unable to break through from these they finally resorted to the "magic toe" of Bouris who proceeded to drop kick two more penalties for the winning six points. As both these kicks were from at least 40 yards out with a strong cross wind the Blues were more than happy with his performance.

It was shortly after this that the Blues lost their scrum-half Tom Bell, who was thrown out along with a York player for fighting. With a bit of player juggling the Blues managed to hold on for the win.

Besides the outstanding kicking of Bouris the Blues demonstrated little of the good rugby they can play. However a number of players had a good game, including winger Brooks who at one point ran across the entire field to make an excellent tackle to break up a Yeomen play that was heading for a try. Hooker Wickens was in good form too as he won the ball almost half the time it was York's ball in the scrums.

There is no doubt with some tackling and line-out practice the second XV will definitely be a top team in their division. They are now 2-0-0 in league play as well as having a game defaulted to them by Trent.

Some short notes...besides Code, prop Bob Algie also may be lost to the first XV for Saturday's game; he too needed stitches to close a gash over his eye...captain John Drummond is still recovering from a knee injury and it is uncertain whether he can play against RMC...over five players came off the field on Wednesday with some sort of head injury due to a lot of flying elbows; perhaps this is evidence of the level of frustration of the players because of the refereeing...unofficial count has 20 penalties awarded against the Toronto first XV and only 3 against York...the Blues can still take the league as one of their home games is against York on Oct. 31.

Chile day sparsely attended, SAC blasts coup recognition

By TINA SREBOTNJAK

Last Friday's day of mourning for those killed in Chile's military coup, although approved by U of T president John Evans, was not endorsed by the U of T Faculty Association. Endorsement was refused because it was the association's policy to protest only incidents which "directly threaten academic freedom."

After a letter from the faculty association was read, Innis College principal Peter Russell commented "I hope my academic freedom never depends on the Faculty Association."

Faculty Association president W. H. Nelson, not making the distinction between academic freedom and freedom of the people, endorsed the day of mourning anyway, and sent a message to that effect to the "Tribute to Free Chile" held at Convocation Hall on that day.

The sparsely-attended ceremony mourning the alleged suicidal death of Salvador Allende and murder of countless others in the bloody coup of September 11, was presided over by Innis College principal Peter Russell. Russell, acting for Evans, stated that students and faculty members at U of T must be concerned with the repression of freedom, whenever and wherever it occurs.

Brian Mossop, vice president of the Graduate Students' Association along with SAC president Bob Anderson, denounced Canada's recognition of the junta and American participation in the takeover.

Enrique Neuburg, a native Chilean and graduate student at U of T, pointed out the universal nature of Chilean aspirations. He said Chile's struggle "to break economic dependence on foreign powers, to establish an independent international policy, and to control its own resources" is representative of the rightful duty of every nation. He saw Allende's death and the military takeover as a catastrophe of immense proportions and much more than the death of a socialist dream.

"It is not for Chile we mourn today; it is for all mankind," Neuburg also said that Chilean universities "are being invaded by ground forces, and hundreds are brutally arrested." He went on to say that all political parties of the left, the unions, and the student organizations are being declared illegal, and all liberal political ideas are being purged from the universities.

Included in the ceremony was the reading of several poems by the late Chilean Nobel Prize winner for Literature, Pablo Neruda. These were read in Spanish and English by Gloria Montano from the Institute for Spanish Studies. The audience was urged to demonstrate against the take-over at the mass rally planned for October 18 at which Michel Chartrand, Quebec trade union leader is to speak. November 4 is the day designated for world-wide protest by a conference in Helsinki two weeks ago.

The ceremony closed with the playing of the Chilean national anthem, and the reading of Allende's last words, translated by Alfonso Grau, a graduate student at U of T: "This is certainly the last time that I will speak to you. . . I shall sacrifice my life for the people. . . We shall always be together. The people must not let themselves be humiliated. Long live Chile! Long live the people! Long live the workers!"

The ceremony was sponsored by SAC, the Graduate Students' Union, and the Committee for a Democratic Chile.

Didn't publish, prof perishes

Another popular professor has been denied tenure because of his so-called lack of research. Erindale Botany professor Gary Thaler is now appealing to U of T President John Evans for a review of the July decision by a departmental tenure committee.

A member of the Erindale faculty since 1967, Thaler is an "excellent teacher" according to Erindale student council education commissioner Paul Trueman.

Trueman said that in last year's course evaluations of a three-professor, first-year biology course Thaler had "outshone" the other two professors.

teaching ability and said that Thaler was "a good teacher but not an exceptional one". Chant is a prominent member of Pollution Probe.

Thaler himself refused to comment saying "I have submitted a request for an appeal committee to the president and I am waiting for a reply. Since it is pending that is all I have to say."

Thaler's tenure denial follows similar denials last year in the mathematics department of popular professors Michael Mather and David Spring. Earlier this year, the case of Stephen Salaff was appealed and turned down.

Thaler has been a controversial figure because of his unorthodox teaching style. Last year he assigned a review of a radical biology book to his first year students.

According to graduate student Bruce Pendril, a former student of Thaler, he "is a very good teacher who has a good rapport with his students." Pendril said that Thaler is working on research in a very innovative field, plant geography.

Thaler has been active in campus and college affairs as a member of the Erindale College Council and the Governing Council. He has a reputation of supporting students interests and was a vocal supporter of staff-student parity.

According to zoology chairman Donald Chant who sat on the tenure committee, the major reason for the denial of tenure was Thaler's "lack of research contribution." He admitted there was some discussion of

Chilean refugees just 'visiting'

The 15 persons from Chile who arrived in Canada on Sunday have not applied for refugee status but rather are in the country as visitors, Immigration Minister Robert Andras said Tuesday.

Answering questions in a Toronto press conference, Andras indicated the 15 are in Canada for three months only as visitors holding special "minister's permits" to remain in Canada.

"They were allowed in as visitors with visas temporarily with the understanding that after three months they may have to leave Canada," Andras said.

The 15 came to Canada to escape the recent military coup in Chile. Some had taken refuge in the Canadian embassy in Santiago prior to their leaving on a CP Air flight to Montreal.

Andras said the government is providing no special consideration financially for the 15 people, but other sources indicated they are staying in the Holiday Inn in Montreal at government expense.

Mrs. Gene Edmunds, assistant deputy minister of immigration, said that so far there has been no demand from people in Chile to come to Canada.

However a newscast on the CTV network and independent eyewitnesses confirm that the Canadian embassy, located on the 10th floor of a downtown Santiago office building, is locked and bolted shut.

Only persons producing a valid Canadian passport are allowed to enter the embassy, and embassy officials have established a policy of calling Chilean military authorities should any non-Canadian enter the Canadian sector of the building, one eyewitness told The Varsity.

However Edmunds, who admits she has not been to Chile since the coup, says that the doors to the embassy are open.

She says Canada has no policy at this time of declaring that Canada is open for refugees.

"We want to be flexible," she said.

Under the Immigration Act, a Chilean person could apply for refugee status once in Canada, according to immigration officials, but so far there has been no policy statement from Ottawa regarding a Chilean being able to get refugee status at the Canadian embassy in Santiago.

ATTENTION: STUDENTS WHO ARE IN CANADA ON A VISITOR'S OR STUDENT VISA AND WHO WISH TO APPLY FOR LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS

Under a recent amendment to the Immigration Act, persons in Canada on visitor's or student visas as of November 30, 1972, who have resided in Canada continuously since that date, may apply for landed immigrant status before October 15, 1973. Applications under this amendment will be assessed according to a special lenient set of criteria including length of residence, family relationships, employment record and compelling compassionate circumstances.

Consideration will also be given to applications from persons on student visas who have left Canada for a brief period since November 30, 1972, but who have otherwise maintained their residence here.

Students under contract to return to their countries of origin, and those who have received Minister's Permits are excluded from the provisions of the recent amendment.

Since this is the last chance non-residents will have to apply for landed immigrant status from within Canada, persons who wish to become permanent residents should register at the Canada Immigration Centre, 480 University Avenue, before OCTOBER 15, 1973.

Questions about applications for landed immigrant status under these amendments should be directed to:

Spadina houses doomed to make room for subway, Metro Executive decides

By LIZ MORRISON

On October 2, Metro Executive Committee approved the acquisition and demolition of 17 houses on Spadina Road north of Bloor to make way for the planned Spadina subway.

Two houses, 9 Spadina Road and 14 Madison Avenue were taken off the list of houses required by next year, until there is more information on the positioning of the walkway and the curve of the subway route.

Metro already owns at least nine of the houses, but none of the other owners of houses on Spadina Road whom The Varsity spoke to had been notified that the motion had gone through the committee.

Mrs. O. Karabanow said they (the owners and occupiers) are "sitting in the dark" about Council's moves. "The people have been saved from one thing," she added, "but it's no consolation that it's now a subway instead of a highway. Lightning shouldn't strike twice."

Karabanow maintains that the houses on Spadina Road serve a very important function in housing students near the campus and in providing short and long-term accommodation. One of her tenants is a pensioner who will experience some hardship and difficulty in finding alternative accommodation.

Karabanow has lived in the house for 20 years and has spent a lot of money on it in renovations and upkeep.

Other owners of private homes The Varsity spoke to were resigned to the move. One elderly widow was not happy to leave the house she had lived in for nearly 40 years but was preparing to do so. She had been given about six months notice after making her own inquiries.

Another long-time resident and owner "had heard about the plan for the last ten years." She had not done any renovations, expecting to be forced to move out if the subway and expressway went through. However, she was recently approached by a real estate agent. The house next door has just been sold, even though Metro will be acquiring it.

Most of the properties are required by January 1 1974 and August 1 1974 at the latest. The Spadina Road houses are mainly semi-detached, owned privately or by Metro. One of the houses to be demolished is occupied by the Toronto Anti-Draft Programme, Planned Parenthood and the Nishnawbe Institute.

Karabanow thinks that the subway should be re-routed further west. She feels there is a strong need for group protest on this matter.

There has been opposition to the subway route which will run from Wilson Heights Avenue in North York to the St. George subway station and which will cut through two ravines. The City Council voted in favor of a Bathurst St. alignment. Protests have been made on the basis that the subway will be under-used and the Cedarvale and Norkheimer ravines will be irreparably damaged when they are dug up for the subway.

There is also increasing evidence that a Queen Street subway line would be more effective in moving more people.

The Spadina subway was approved by Metro Council earlier this year by a 15-14 vote. The deciding vote was cast by the late Metro Chairman Ab Campbell, an appointed, not an elected, official, and for various reasons three borough mayors did not participate in the crucial vote.

The decision was appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board, and finally to the Davis cabinet, but in both cases approval for the Spadina route was given.

A combined subway and expressway plan was first proposed in 1956 by the then Metro Deputy Planning Commissioner. The expressway plan was finally quashed by the William Davis' cabinet in June 1972 shortly before the last provincial election. However the subway, which will take about four years to build, is following the old expressway alignment.

Law of the jungle

The Political Economy department has handed out a booklet on plagiarism which tells students about restrictive sections of the new discipline code without mentioning that it has not been given final approval.

The booklet highlights sections of the new code that would make it an offense to use false references, use anyone else's idea or expression of an idea as your own, use any unauthorized aids and submit papers for credit in two courses without permission.

It also lists the possible academic sanctions under the new code which range from a warning or reprimand to failure in a course, suspension, loss of credit in all courses, and expulsion.

The department also includes its own statement on plagiarism which it says "complements" the new behaviour code. This statement threatens a mark of zero for failing to provide adequate documentation as well as "presenting the ideas or words or another as your own."

It calls this practice "dishonest and academically worthless" and further rhapsodizes that "the aim of scholarship is to develop your own ideas and research and only by trying to develop your own thoughts and arguments will you mature academically."

Abolish fees: SFU

BURNABY BC(CUP) — Claiming that "the continuation of tuition fees discriminates and belongs to the 19th century," the Students' Council executive at Simon Fraser University (SFU) has asked the provincial government to abolish tuition fees.

"We believe that tuition fees should not be part of an education system in a democratic and progressive society", the council executive said in a motion to be presented to the NDP Cabinet and backbenchers.

This motion was contained in a number of recommendations from the council executive to the government in an attempt to influence the content of the new universities act that the provincial government has promised.

The students also requested a reorganization of the university's Board of Governors giving more representation to students and the non-university community, and the establishment of a freeze on the creation of new departments or new programmes or other inter-departmental restructuring until either the new act is passed or a majority of students in a department agree to proposed changes.

Student council officials are attempting to get other universities in British Columbia to support their proposals.

Andras wants more immigrants landed

Claiming there are "absolutely no plans of a witch hunt" for illegal immigrants after October 15, Immigration Minister Robert Andras delivered a prepared text Tuesday urging illegal immigrants to come forward during the last days of immigration's grace period which expires next Monday.

Andras hammered home that there will be no extension of the Monday night deadline for registration of illegal persons to be judged on relaxed criteria.

More than 90 per cent of the more than 34,000 non-Canadian students in Canada last year are potentially eligible for the grace period provided they have stayed in Canada since November 30, 1972 — the residency requirement which applies to all illegal immigrants who come forward for the grace period.

Andras, when asked to confirm or deny the persistent rumors in Toronto about roundups after October 15, replied there are no witch hunts planned and there is no retention or training of large number of enforcement officers for such a purpose.

Asked if regular police forces might be used instead, Andras replied that after October 15 deportation of illegal immigrants would only occur during "the normal course of events."

So far 39,417 persons have registered with the government as illegal immigrants for the grace period and Andras said 99.9 per cent of them have been granted landed immigrant status.

An illegal immigrant who misses the Monday night deadline faces deportation without any rights of appeal, Andras said.

Bad news, racing fans. The excitement of crossing Queen's Park will be gone soon. See page 14.

The Varsity is a member of Canadian University Press, was founded in 1880 and is published by the Students' Administrative Council of the University of Toronto and is printed by Darsons Press Ltd. Opinions expressed in this newspaper are not necessarily those of the Students' Administrative Council or the administration of the university. Formal complaints about the editorial or business operation of the paper may be addressed to the Chairman, Campus Relations Committee, Varsity Board of Directors, 91 St. George St.

Simcoe Hall policy is hypocritical

While the Toronto Toros waltzed their way around Varsity Arena Sunday night (and then again last night) Better Read Graphics and New Hogtown Press were being threatened with expropriation by the university administration. The people at Simcoe Hall — among them Business Affairs vice-president Alex Rankin and Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway — have decided that the university solicitors are correct in assuming that "such agreement would not comply with zoning provisions relating to commercial operations." But do U of T Press, the Toronto Toros, and campus food caterers exist in areas zoned for such activities? And was the old SAC Press — in existence until late last year — also, like Better Read, operating illegally?

The university appears rather hesitant in approving an operation that might help students produce such valuable material as leaflets (during student campaigns) and course union critiques. A silenced press means, of course, no way to voice opposition to the administration of this campus.

In late July SAC president Bob Anderson stated the case for keeping Better Read Graphics, and we feel his reasoning would also apply to New Hogtown Press. Anderson began by making the point that the university's decision about Better Read was inconsistent with the policy applied to other "commercial" use of university property or facilities.

Anderson noted that the university solicitors, Cassels-Brock, had expressed reservations about the rental of equipment from another potentially profit-making corporation, and agreed that the objection was valid since the rental fee could have been used to transfer profits to the members. But Anderson also indicated that this was, in fact, "not the intent of the proposal", and was willing to set up a system whereby any transfer of profits to Better Read through rental of equipment would be prevented.

Anderson also pointed out that SAC will be in a position to audit the books of Better Read on a regular basis and that any excessive payment of salaries, constituting distribution of profits, would result in the cancellation of the agreement.

The conclusion drawn from the refutation of the university solicitors opinion was that Better Read is a bona fide non-profit organization, with goals of an educational nature" and, "its presence on the university campus would in no way be incongruous".

And SAC covered the only other argument the university was able to come up with — municipal taxation. Anderson said in his letter that "SAC would be indemnified by Better Read for any municipal taxes that might be levied as a result of the printing operation. The SAC in turn, is prepared to guarantee the payment of any municipal taxes, should these be assessed against the university."

As Anderson so aptly put it: "We understand the University's concern that allowing 'commercial' use of some University property might jeopardize the tax exempt status of other parts. However, it is our feeling that the risks arising from this proposal should be far less than those arising from other larger and better publicized activities, such as the commercial rental facilities or the operations of the University of Toronto Press, the Bookroom and the commercially catered cafeterias on campus."

And to further seal his argument Anderson indicated in his letter that the University of Toronto Press "at present accepts outside printing business. I have given Miss Reimer (campus services co-ordinator) documentary evidence of this fact." Also "the university already rents space to outside commercial interests, namely the caterers operating on campus". Anderson therefore felt there was sufficient precedent for the establishment of an operation like Ontario Alternate on the University of Toronto campus.

But the businessman — dominated Business Affairs committee of the Governing Council last Thursday thought otherwise.

We don't feel that the administration or its solicitors have made a good enough case for tossing out organizations such as New Hogtown Press and Better Read Graphics. Shouldn't they start with the Toros?

Varsity searches its soul

We are doing a lot of thinking right now about publishing The Varsity twice a week instead of the current three times a week.

The proposal getting the most talk around the editorial offices revolves around issues on the streets Mondays and Thursdays.

Right now it's just talk, and we hope there's a lot more, especially during this Friday's weekly staff meeting.

The idea centres around a basic notion that the immediacy of new copy, which has characterized the campus press over the last few years, just doesn't exist to the extent it used to.

Likewise, with fewer rat-race publication deadlines to meet, there will be more time to do more in-depth coverage of the news, which is the kind of news which is now needing coverage.

As an example, our constant harping on the big scoop really isn't so much PR nonsense. An interesting, perhaps even big, scoop has been gathering dust on the shelf simply for lack of time to do the necessary further research before writing it up.

And if there's one goody, there just have to be more.

Most of our talk has revolved around the editorial necessity of going to twice a week. Finances aren't the problem. The Varsity can hack it either two or three times a week as far as the money goes.

Nor would fewer days mean fewer pages. The same total number of pages per week would still be published.

Die-hard traditionalists may likely say that this violates the traditional publication schedule. While this may be true of recent Varsity history, going back over the years, the paper has published anywhere from once to five-times per week.

Others may say that the cut-back is just that, a cut back. Well, those are the sort of comments we want to hear. Just what are the thoughts out there?

We're only talking about this year. Certainly future Varsity staffs will have their thoughts. We're speaking about our thoughts for this year and we'd like some feedback.

The best editorial work has been done on the longer more in-depth work, which takes time. Likewise, the shorter "hard news" has been distinctly lacking.

Not that The Varsity can't come out on short notice if the news merits the extra edition. The 1971 extra issues during the library occupation can be done again this year in a similar manner if the hard breaking news warrants it.

Friday editions, which are usually the longest, containing the review section, are frequently left in campus boxes since not that many people are around Fridays, so a different day seems logical.

The point of all this is that we want some of your reaction to the idea, but we need it quickly as a decision has to be made quite soon (hopefully the staff will arrive at some sort of consensus on Friday), mainly because we have our bureaucracy to deal with to make the change. Be in touch - SOON.

Levitt defends his record

The "cheap shot" journalism of Varsity's editorial ("Will Levitt Review Act?") calls me the "new Paul Cadario", but makes the Varsity look more like the "new Toronto Sun". Your nasty and insulting attack fastens on the issue of the Committee to Review the U of T Act. Because I have yet to resign from the Committee, on which students are a minority, you accuse me of "selling out".

At the most we are debating tactics. I was the first to raise this issue on the Governing Council, my record of fighting the University's dishonesty and contempt for students is excellent, and there are strong reasons, which you ignore, as to why students should participate, at least temporarily, on the Committee. Boycotting is rarely a successful tactic. Would it not be more effective to challenge and attack the Committee and then resign after clearly demonstrating, instead of merely presupposing its lack of response to the student position? Especially since the two other student members show no intention of leaving the committee. Why aren't they attacked, particularly since one of them supported the committee's composition? Consistent with your position would be attacking all the student governors as 'sellouts' for not resigning from the Governing Council, which has even a lower percentage of students than the Review Committee.

Certainly there are more likely "sellouts" among the student governors. My record on the Council, as Varsity's coverage will bear out, has been one of consistently challenging, criticizing, and exposing the role and activities of the Governing Council. This was the platform of the Reform Slate, a platform consistent with my decision on the Review Committee. As I mention above, I was first to raise and fight on the issue of the student minority in the Committee. I initiated and fought strenuously on the 188 Yonge St. issue. And I have been the only governor to attack the university's employment of Dr. Ian Hector, and to expose the racist and oppressive ideology taught at U of T. Incidentally, Varsity's coverage of the Hector issue has been rather pitiful.

I wish I could figure out what kind of game you're playing. You didn't even discuss my position with me before printing your attack.

The biggest doubt raised by your editorial is how seriously The Varsity wants to attack and expose the Governing Council. Your singing out of me for attack indicates an intention to sabotage the efforts, not to build them. If Varsity genuinely wants to contribute to the fight against the elitist and reactionary Governing Council, then its criticisms of my approach should be friendly, not antagonistic. No one can have been more pleased by your editorial than John Evans, Malim Harding, and the whole gang group responsible for the Review Committee and its 20 per cent student representation.

Prof disowns Faculty Ass'n

"I hope that my liberty never depends on the University of Toronto Faculty Association," said Innis College Principal Peter Russell to the Chile memorial meeting he was chairing last Friday.

Friday was the official U of T day of mourning for the overthrow of democratic Chile. This day of mourning was supported by president Evans, SAC president Anderson, and students and faculty from all sections of the university. But the Council of the U of T Faculty Association, which claims to represent me as a faculty member, refused its support. UTFA president W. H. Nelson wrote to the memorial meeting to express endorsement of it personally, but explained that his Council's set policy was to take no stand on political questions except where a threat to academic freedom was clearly involved; and in the view of the council there was still only "presumptive" evidence of any such threat existing in Chile.

Have the members of the UTFA Council not been reading their newspapers or watching TV lately? Has no one told them of the mass arrests, including many students and faculty, or the book bonfires in the streets?

Today, in many Chilean universities all faculty contracts — by order of the military junta — have been suspended wholesale pending selective rehiring. Many Chilean students have been expelled simply for political activities. At the University of Concepcion, two whole academic departments have been closed down indefinitely. At the State Technical University in Santiago, badly damaged by aerial bombardment, University Rector Enrique Kirberg has been placed under arrest.

As I write, classes have still not resumed in any universities in Chile. Duly constituted university officials, including all university rectors, have been displaced, and the new education minister, Rear-Admiral Hugo Castro Jimenez, has announced publicly a "profound restructuring of Chilean higher education", which has already involved the appointment of six new university rectors, one a former air force commander-in-chief, four retired naval officers and one an army colonel (Globe and Mail, October 4th).

However, our UTFA Council thinks there is evidence for academic freedom being infringed in Chile is only presumptive. As a U of T faculty member, I want to dissociate myself as forcibly as I am able from such a piece of intellectual impudence.

Who needs the discipline code?

The state of affairs concerning the discipline code could not be more clear. We didn't ask for it; we don't need it; we had no say in its creation, and past student leaders have specifically argued against it. The administration is attempting to push it on the students and is spreading confusion and syrup all over it.

Why do we need a new code other than the code of behavior known as the Criminal Code of Canada, if indeed we do need that? Even though the administration feels that there is a new crisis at the U of T that warrants special powers act, why does SAC apparently try to go along with Simcoe Hall's paranoid behaviour? Is SAC trying to humor them? (Of course I like you darling, but drop that knife!)

Over impassioned pleas of postponement until September, the Governing Council, in the last meeting of its term of office, pushed through the discipline code. They seem very anxious about it. September has come and gone. Does this mean that SAC doesn't care about the issue enough to take a clear and firm position? Governing Council has exhibited the ability to do whatever it chooses, they certainly reserve the right to interpret the facts, anyway it chooses.

In other articles and editorials, the issue has been well played up. One fact about the history of discipline structures going back at least five years is of particular significance. Obviously the student revolts in the US at Columbia and Berkeley, threw a scare into the administrators here. When the administration tried to use cops, in the California tradition, they were met with fierce indignation on the part of the students. Obviously a new tactic was necessary for Simcoe Hall in their drive to subdue student unrest. The meaning of the message in this situation was not the content of the discipline code, but whether or not the students would accept it and in fact subdue themselves. And SAC splits on the question: way to go team!

The latest document, that is supposed to be a SAC position paper is nothing of the sort. It is a legalistic interpretation of the code. It takes the rhetoric of the code forward to its inevitable "piggy" conclusions. But what is not mentioned in this non-position paper is that the SAC president, Bob Anderson, would rather that the Governing Council reject his "code". This makes it easier for him to reject theirs!

Despite all this, people still talk about the "good parts" of the code. They say that we should not throw out the good parts with the bad; without stopping to think why Governing Council wanted the good parts in with the bad parts in the first place. Maybe we should insist on a warning beep before the "bad parts"?

It seems clear to us that the administration is up to its old tricks. Why is SAC so slow? It is time to stop playing into the hands of the administration by engaging in endless discussion. SAC must take a stand on this issue and very quickly. We cannot wait for the next student arrest or expulsion before doing anything.

The struggle around the discipline code would only begin with SAC's belated denunciation. The administration admits to having spent $300,000 on the report over the past five years! They will not be wholly swayed by thirty people taking a vote in a deserted cafeteria. SAC should be prepared to move out to get mass student support for their position. Just as they are doing in the present referendum campaign. We must be prepared for the next move of those who control this university.

Six years after, Che eulogized

The purpose of this letter in light of the recent developments in Chile is to pay tribute to one of the most extraordinary revolutionary comrades of the Cuban revolution. A man who is well known for his simplicity, his character, his naturalness, his comradely attitude and his profound spirit of hatred and loathing for imperialism.

Che fell defending the interests of the exploited and oppressed people of Latin America. He gave his life for a cause that was aimed at smashing all forms of corruption and oppression.

Che wanted to build a new man and a new society. A society that was based on love and happiness instead of money and competition. It was for these ideas that the CIA found it necessary to murder him.

Che left Cuba in 1965 because he felt his efforts would be more advantageous in other parts of the world. In war Che found his kind of peace. In liberating others, he liberated himself.

Che went to Africa to offer his services in the struggle in the Congo but after nine months of relative failure he decided to leave. He could not teach his African pupils anything much from his experience in Cuba.

Revolutionary prospects were forming in Bolivia and so Che left the Congo for Bolivia (via Cuba) in 1966. Che said that

There are no frontiers in this struggle to the death. We cannot remain indifferent in the face of what occurs in any part of the world. A victory for any one country against imperialism is our victory, just as a defeat for any one country is a defeat for all. The practice of proletarian internationalism is not only a duty of the countries which are struggling to ensure a better future; it is also an unavoidable necessity.

Before he went to the Congo, at the Latin American Conference of Solidarity Che explained that if death surprised him anywhere, it would be welcome as long as his battle cry had reached a receptive ear and another hand was stretched out to take up his rifle.

He wrote to his children:

If you ever have to read this letter, it will be because I won't be with you. You practically won't remember me, and the smaller ones won't remember me at all. Your father has been a man who acts as he believes and truly, he has been loyal to his convictions.

"Grow up like good revolutionaries. Study hard so that you can master the technical ability to master nature. Remember the revolution is the important thing that each of us, alone, is worth nothing.

Above all, always be able to feel deeply any injustice committed against anyone in any part of the world. It's a revolutionary's most beautiful quality.

Until always, my children, I still hope to see you. A great big kiss and a hug from

Papa

On the 8th of October 1967 a peasant woman notified the army that she had heard voices along the banks of the Yuro close to the spot where it ran into the San Antonio River. As Fidel put it, "by a stroke of luck" Che was captured after a fierce battle and taken to an old school house.

Richard Rojo described the murder of Che in the following way:

Captain Prado came up behind Guevara and fired a burst from his machine gun at his neck from above. Four bullets struck him. Colonel Sainchez drew near and shot a single bullet from his 9 mm. pistol. It penetrated Che's heart and one of his lungs. It was the coup de grace. Che's eyes were wide open and very peaceful. There was a smile on his lips. He was dead.

The development of capitalism is soaked in blood and entrenched in horrifying oppression. One group wants everything for nothing. The other group wants everything for every body. Today in Chile, thousands of young revolutionaries are being ruthlessly tortured and then murdered. The national bourgeoisie is happy. Uncle Sam is ecstatically jubilant. Murder and hatred has, for the time being, triumphed. Love and happiness for the time being has been set back. But history is hard and implacable and will judge at the appropriate time when these tyrants will be put in their appropriate places six feet under.

The ideas of Che Guevara are international, passionate and revolutionary. Che's ideas are taken into every struggle for freedom. The people who were boasting of victory because of Che's death are miserably mistaken. They are mistaken when they think his death is the end of his ideas, his tactics, his concept of guerrilla warfare, his thesis. Che fell as a mortal man, but his ideas have not. It is these ideas that make every tyrant tremble.

Let us not forget that six years ago yesterday, on October 9th 1967 in La Higuera Bolivia, Che Guevara was murdered. In Che's words:

"We must grow tough, but without ever losing our tenderness."

Varsity misses tiger tale 'scoop'

The Varsity has often stated that its reporters have their ears close to the ground, waiting for the "big scoop." However, the Varsity missed a great scoop and I rather suspect it did so because only a handful of its reporters are tuned to receive anything other than political wave lengths.

Dr. Gunter Voss, director of the Metro Toronto Zoo, speaking at the Ramsay Wright Building on Thursday, September 27, offered to sell two tigers to any interested party. And what's more, he gave students some practical advice on how to coax a young, travel-weary zebra out of an airways shipping crate.

To this point, I do not believe Dr. Voss has been approached concerning the sale of the tigers. He is certainly not an unreasonable man to deal with. Perhaps officials of the University would be wise to purchase these creatures and keep them lodged in front of the entrance to the Sacred Stacks at the Roberts Library.

The problem presented by moving the zebra out of the shipping crate was especially difficult because the crate was equipped with only one sliding door rather than the customary two. Dr. Voss, drawing on his vast zoo experience in both Europe and Canada, solved the problem by kicking the nose of the zebra with straw, thus forcing the beast to back away. After a few repetitions of this technique, the young animal had backed itself out of the one sliding door of the crate.

Dr. Voss outlined the growth of the zoo from its beginning in 1966 to the present. In 1966, a small group of citizens formed the Metro Toronto Zoological Society in order to persuade civic officials to support a zoo. After the go-ahead was given, the Society, in conjunction with the Municipality of Metro Toronto and the Metro Toronto and Region Conservation Authority, entered into a long period of planning and negotiations for a site. A lovely, forested 711 acre parcel of land in Scarborough was eventually procured to house the zoo.

Although the zoo is not slated to open until August, 1974, Dr. Voss was tremendously enthusiastic and his enthusiasm seemed to grow even greater when he sensed the interest of his listeners. He stressed the theme on which the zoo is founded — the relationship of Man to Nature — and talked with an evangelistic zeal about the zoo's "mission" of impressing upon the public the vital importance of conservation. Indeed, Dr. Voss was visibly grieved when he showed a slide of a vast forested area that had to be stripped bald for the purposes of construction of a zoo parking lot.

Gerald Durrell had "a zoo in his luggage"; Dr. Voss has a zoo in his mind. In fact, the night he talked in the Ramsay Wright Building was the first night he had left the zoo before dark in a number of months. One cannot help but think that the Metro Zoo with such enthusiastic and competent direction will achieve its ambition to become the finest zoo in the world.

For their neglect of the Voss meeting, Varsity staffers should be sentenced to a month on the animal cage cleaning detail in the Ramsay Wright labs.

Evans wants researchers to pay full costs

Research hurts other programs, UofT complains

When the U of T accepts money to do research projects, particularly for the provincial and federal governments, other programs at the university suffer, according to a draft statement the university will submit to the provincial Committee on University Affairs in November.

At a meeting last week of the Governing Council's External Affairs Committee that was considering the statement, U of T President John Evans said the university "was trying to persuade people who contract for research to pay the full costs of research instead of just the direct costs," but the process was a slow one.

According to the brief, the Governing Council has directed that applications for outside grants should cover full direct costs of research, including items like computer time and some salaries that were formerly absorbed by the university. The Office of Research Administration also says that the university, wherever possible, attempts to get an additional 30 per cent of the direct costs to help cover overhead. This was a policy initially started by the former Board of Governors.

However, even if the university were able to secure the additional 30 per cent — and certain government bodies like the National Research Council, the Medical Research Council, and the Canada Council pay no overhead costs at all — it still wouldn't cover indirect costs. According to the Office of Research Administration, overhead costs run at 44 per cent of direct research costs. Last year, the university received a total of more than $24,000,000 in research grants. Overhead costs would therefore run over $10,500,000.

Since it is impossible to receive full payment when the university is contracted to do research, the university must use Basic Income Units, grants received for students from the provincial government, to support the project.

The problem, the draft statement for the CUA points out, is more accentuated, and the university is less justified, in supporting the research when the project is commissioned only because the university has the unique expertise or facilities to perform the work the Province or the Federal Government wants" and when it does not relate to "teaching and an increase of basic knowledge."

The statement goes on to charge that even when the research does "relate to teaching," under the present system of compensation the university gets short-changed.

Fifty per cent of additional costs that universities incur (doing research for example) is collected by the province from the federal government. However, it is distributed to Ontario universities, not on the basis of how much research is done, but in proportion to the number of students attending the university. Therefore a university that does no research gets as much as a university that does, providing both institutions had the same number of students.

Research projects can also disrupt university activities in other ways besides draining off money that could be used to support teaching or other university activities. If a major research project is started or ended suddenly, the university may be short of staff, or might have too many teachers in a department, who cannot be dismissed. The university may also be "left with a large buildup of facilities" the draft statement to the CUA points out. All of these produce inconvenience and cause additional expense.

Research is often carried on by graduate students who use the research results in papers, or by staff who must publish papers and fulfill the university's "function of disseminating knowledge." But the draft statement for the CUA indicates that such a right to publish is in conflict with its requirements. Thus much contracted research could not be used either by students in search of a degree, or by staff looking to enhance their list of published works.

According to the Office of Research Administration, most research money comes from the federal and provincial governments. Last year, only $340,927 or about 2 per cent of the total research grants came from Canadian companies; $43,900 came from American companies; and $756,978 came from the United States Government.

Will Innis ditch SAC?

Innis students will have the chance to decide whether they want to remain with or leave the gentle wing of mother SAC sometime this month. Previous attempts by Meds students and the Faculty of Education to leave SAC have failed.

The SAC executive agreed to give Innis $100 to survey the 650 students on the value of SAC.

SAC president Bob Anderson felt that the information gathered in the mail survey would be valuable in determining SAC policy in the future and viewed the referendum as a joint SAC-Innis project. However, a minority of the executive strongly opposed granting any money to the college under these circumstances. SAC finance commissioner Joe Redican termed it "blackmail" in an interview after the meeting.

Innis student president Shelly Sinukoff ran last year on a political platform that included withdrawal from SAC.

The Innis College student society intend to solicit opinions from their membership by mail, and then circulate the responses by mail also.

Innis student councilors have felt alienated by SAC in the past, and feel that there is too much bureaucracy. They were refused a grant earlier this year for the sod-turning ceremony Innis held to mark completion of plans for the new Innis headquarters. SAC's reason for this refusal was that the event was not university-wide and that too many university administrators were involved.

Chairman of the Innis referendum committee Joe Smith is working hard to organize the "initial dialogue." He is finding the process valuable since "many people are being educated about what SAC does."

Abortion in courts

MONTREAL (CUP) — The constitutional right of a woman to have an abortion is being tested in Montreal federal courts, as Dr. Henry Morgentaler faces six charges of performing illegal abortions. These charges were laid following a raid on Morgentaler's clinic August 15 in which police confiscated Morgentaler's files and equipment.

Morgentaler has publicly admitted to performing nearly 5,000 abortions over the past five years. None of his patients died. "I do not believe that using medically safe abortions is a criminal act," Morgentaler has said.

Last spring, the CTV program W5 filmed Morgentaler as he performed an abortion at his clinic. The film was seized by the authorities and is now being used by the prosecution as evidence in the charges laid against him.

Morgentaler's lawyer, Claude Armand Sheppard, has challenged the article of the criminal code dealing with abortion. Sheppard says that the law is discriminatory and contradicts the Canadian constitution and Bill of Rights, which state that all people are equal before the law, because women do not have equal access to the means prescribed in the Abortion Law.

Under the present law, an appeal for abortion can be made to a three-man hospital committee on the basis that the pregnancy would endanger the life and health of the mother. It is up to individual hospitals to set up such committees.

Sheppard has argued that the present law discriminates against the rural Quebecois since there are virtually none of these hospital committees in rural Quebec. Of the 23 abortion committees only 12 are French speaking. In 1972, half of these French boards did not approve a single abortion.

Three members of Parliament have offered their support to Morgentaler: Stuart Leggett (NDP-Vancouver Kingsway), Peter Reilly (PC-Ottawa West) and Grace MacInnis (NDP-Vancouver Kingsway). Leggett has a private member's bill before the Commons calling for the removal of abortion from the criminal code.

Morgentaler appears hopeful in his constitutional battle in the courts. "I am more firmly convinced than ever that the law under which I am now being tried is unjust, cruel, dangerous to women, and unnecessarily restrictive," he said.

Erin, Scar dislike provincial financing formula

Both Erindale and Scarborough Colleges have been hit hard by the Province's new slip-year formula financing which comes into effect for the first time this academic year.

The charge comes in reports from Erindale and Scarborough which will be incorporated in a university brief to the province's Committee on University Affairs, a body which advises the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

Under the slip-year financing plan, colleges and universities estimate their income and determine their budgets according to the number of students enrolled the previous year on December 1.

Previously, grants for one year were given on the basis on enrolment in that same year, but this did not allow for any advance planning. The grants are calculated according to a weighted formula in which one Basic Income Unit (BIU) is given for each first year arts and science student, and various multiples of that up to six are given for students in other disciplines and other levels.

According to the Erindale brief, the slip-year financing plan is beneficial for an institution with decreasing enrolment, but it is a disaster for a "small, post emergent, rapidly growing institution," and has had the immediate effect of throwing "a well conceived plan into chaos."

At Erindale, undergraduate enrollment has grown between 1972-73 and 1973-74 by 12 per cent, which is according to the brief slightly less than Erindale is built for the future, which doesn't look so hot.

what was projected, but at the same time, enrolment for part-time students continues to increase more rapidly than was anticipated.

Total enrolment at Scarborough College increased by over 20 per cent between this year and last year.

At Erindale slip year financing will produce an accumulated deficit by the end of this year of $498,000 as compared to a deficit of $153,000 if the previous financing scheme had been used. By 1976, the accumulated deficit will be $2,489,000, according to the chart prepared by Erindale College for submission to the CUA.

extraordinary increase in costs.

At the same time that more support is needed because of over-building in anticipation of future expansion, there are additional costs as a result of last spring's freeze on construction. Space originally designed for certain activities will have to be converted for new uses.

At Erindale, first year science student enrolment has increased from 42.2 per cent in 1970-71 to 51.8 per cent of total enrolment in 1973-74. There is an acute shortage of laboratory space. Another problem according to the brief is a need for faculty office space.

Various economy measures have been taken at Erindale in "physical plant, administration and academic support staff, such as secretaries, demonstrators and teaching assistants" the Erindale brief states.

While Erindale and Scarborough are laboring with great difficulty under a tightened budget, the St. George campus remains essentially satisfied with the slip-year financing scheme. According to the draft brief, the university would like a longer period, perhaps three years to be the basis for budget calculations, because budget decisions for 1974-75 for example have to be made even before the December 1973 enrolment counts have become firm.

The university brief also criticizes the fact that the basic income unit value is not set soon enough in advance for budget calculations. Both Scarborough Erindale and the U of T in their draft briefs recommend that an inflationary increase be guaranteed for basic income units so that the universities can meet rising costs.

Support mounts for Artistic strike

Support continues to mount for the strikers at Artistic Woodwork in North York.

Last week, U of T's Students' Administrative Council (SAC) voted to back the strikers in their attempts to obtain basic trade union rights. It also voted to condemn the strikebreaking actions of police.

Since August 21 the strikers have been engaged in a bitter struggle to win collective bargaining rights from management. Frequent charges of police intimidation have won the strikers the active support of teachers, students, and other workers. The police have reacted by sending members of a tactical force to the picket line under the supervision of "Elbows" Magahay, a man with years of experience in professional strikebreaking.

In view of this situation, SAC will hold a rally on Thursday, October 11 at noon in room 1069 of Sid Smith. Striking workers from Artistic Woodwork will explain the nature of their strike and their demands. James Laxer of the Waffle, will speak and is expected to lend support in calling for a stronger student presence on the picket line.

Yesterday morning's picket line was bigger than ever and reflected growing public support. Metro Alderman Dan Heap, who was present at the picket, noted that the Police Association which is demanding an 18 per cent increase in salary, will have to get Metro Council's approval for the new contract. He then urged people to pressure their council representatives into rejecting the new contract. Chanting "minimum wage for police", picketers voiced their opinion of police demands for higher pay.

Heap's remarks were prompted by what he observed of police actions that morning. Police were very free with their elbows and knees as they cleared a path for cars of "scabs" entering the strikebound plant on Densley Avenue.

At least six people were arrested, bringing the total number of arrests to about 56.

Nonetheless, the arrests have not deterred strikers in their fight with the company.

Services will help in boycott

By GRETCHEN ROEDDE

In response to requests from SAC and the Campus Committee to Support the Grape Boycott, University of Toronto food services will be boycotting all Dare and Kraft products, and non-union grapes and lettuce from California.

Internal Affairs vice-president Jill Conway announced the decision last week and explained that she has directed director of Administrative Services M. A. Malcolm to advise the caterers and food services.

SAC Services Commissioner Seymour Kanowitch made the request after the decision was unanimously approved by SAC at the general meeting on September 19.

He said in an interview that a "grace period" of two to three weeks would be allowed, and then a survey of food service outlets would be made to ensure that the decision was being carried out.

While he felt the administrative decision was made in good faith, he thought there might be some difficulty in discriminating between union and non-union produce, and that this would be the primary reason for the survey.

The reason for the boycott, in the case of Kraft, is to support the small Ontario dairy farmers who are threatened by the Kraft monopoly. In the case of Dare and the California produce, the boycott is to support the union of workers who are seeking recognition and improved working conditions.

California lettuce might be taken off the boycott list because of a tentative agreement reached last week between AFL-CIO president George Meany, Teamster president Frank Fitzsimmons, and UFW president Cesar Chavez.

In the agreement, the Teamsters promised not to sign contracts with grape growers and would not renew contracts with lettuce growers when the contracts expired. However, the Teamsters are having second thoughts because of heavy pressure from big grape corporations, and the UFW may continue its double-barrelled boycott.

SAC gives to anti-charity

By MARINA STRAUSS

The Students' Administrative Council decided last week to grant $160 to a group of social welfare workers who are critical of the United Way, so that they can supply information to Metro schools.

Citizens Concerned About Social Policy (CCASP), which objects to United Way's "misleading" promotional material, wants to provide its own material to the Toronto Board of Education.

At the urging of CCASP, the board recently decided not to endorse United Way this year. Instead, materials from both organizations will be distributed to students and staff to facilitate discussion about the United Way and solutions to social problems.

SAC will also organize a public meeting with CCASP to discuss social policies, as well as another meeting with United Way. United Way has refused to publicly debate the issues with the group.

Speaking at last week's SAC general meeting, CCASP spokesman John McCreedy claimed UW "say they won't attend a meeting where people involved in social policy are involved."

United Way has been ineffective in solving social problems," McCreedy contended.

"Businessmen are giving cheap dollars to United Way and appear as good corporate citizens. They get the credit, but the largest amount of money comes from individual wage earners."

The UW board of directors is controlled by the corporate elite, McCreedy said. The businessmen are "giving dollars that are worth 38 cents to them", he claimed. The corporations are paying no taxes on their incomes.

"It's a PR job for the corporation", McCreedy said.

Questioned about what alternative actions the group offered to UW, CCASP member Bob Carther replied that "people who face the problems are those who should solve them."

At the same meeting, SAC decided to sponsor a meeting on October 18 to protest political repression in Chile and donated $200.

The Metro Labor Council, the NDP, the Waffle, York and U of T faculty, and York students' council are also sponsoring the meeting.

Professors vaporized at secret meetings

By JACK GEMMELL

Take a good look at your professors. You may not see some of them next year if they have been denied tenure.

Tenure means a professor's career, and denial of tenure usually means leaving the university forever.

Professors denied tenure are hard to find because they do not want to talk for fear of prejudicing appeals or chances for jobs elsewhere.

Professors interviewed for this article did not want names used, and with one exception, will be referred to anonymously.

The tenure committee in each department meets secretly with the identity of its members kept secret. The reasons for any decisions are also kept secret.

One professor described the committee as a "star chamber."

An air of distrust prevails. Professor "A" rose and closed his door so his colleagues could not overhear him talking to a reporter. Professor "B" never learned what his senior colleagues thought he was doing wrong. He was denied tenure and given no reason.

Several professors complained of this "lack of feedback."

The Canadian Association of University Teachers (the faculty lobby in Ottawa) claims that methods of granting tenure should ensure the right of non-tenured faculty members to criticize existing practices without fear of reprisal.

In reality, no non-tenured professor will openly criticize the chairman of his department because he would have no chance to consider any unfavorable views presented against him.

This is how tenure "protects the process of free inquiry" for a non-tenured faculty member by making him beholden to his senior colleagues and the department chairman.

Teaching ability is supposed to be considered by a departmental tenure committee.

This is a chairman of your average tenure committee. This guy isn't going to fall for that phoney rhetoric about "teaching ability." Nosiree — who says a prof has to be a good teacher?

In a letter to Prof. Mike Mather explaining why he was denied tenure, mathematics chairman George Duff said: "Present standards for the award of tenure require fully competent and satisfactory performance in both teaching and research."

However, Professor "C" was a superb teacher, but only an average researcher, and so he was denied tenure. On the other hand, Prof "D" was a good researcher but an abysmal teacher, coming to lectures unprepared. He has tenure.

"Almost every department doesn't care about student opinions," said David DePoe, fieldworker for the Arts and Science Student Union.

"Analysis of teaching ability in tenure committees is made on the basis of rumor, gossip, hearsay, and isolated bits of information."

"There is no thorough investigation of teaching ability, no serious attempt to find out student opinion," he said.

The philosophy department, however, uses course evaluations it conducts itself. Some departments and faculties do not have any course evaluations. Those which do have them often do not use them in tenure decisions.

In his booklet "A Guide to Teaching Evaluations," University of Western Ontario psychologist H.G. Murray writes that "student ratings are sufficiently reliable and valid (i.e. free of bias) to justify their use as one source of information about teaching effectiveness."

"Highly rated instructors tend to be most effective," Murray said. Murray was writing for the Ontario

A tenure glossary

The Haist rules: in 1967 a committee under Professor Haist of the Engineering faculty set down the procedures for granting tenure, thus establishing tenure as an official policy of appointments at this university and making no provision for students on tenure committees.

The Forster Report: last summer a committee called the Task Force on Academic appointments headed by vice president and provost Don Forster, issued its report advising that the existing system of academic appointments be continued. Students would continue to be excluded from tenure and other staffing committees.

What is tenure? Tenure is a continuing full-time appointment and commitment given by the university to a professor for a job until he

How is tenure granted? A tenure committee grants tenure. In general it consists of the chairman of the department, the dean of the faculty, the dean of graduate studies, or his representative, and four tenured faculty members at least two of which are from the department involved. One important exception: the Sociology department has equal staff-student representation on its tenure committee.

Scenario: The chairman of the department writes to the professor under consideration telling him to submit the papers, books and manuscripts he wishes considered by the tenure committee.

In addition the professor may recommend experts to advise the committee on the value of his research in Confederation of University Faculty Associations, the faculty's provincial lobby.

By contrast, math chairman Duff said last year that "students rate the highest those professors from whom they learn the least." He offered no proof for his statement.

Tenure committees do claim to evaluate teaching. In his letter to Mather, Duff wrote of "indications regarding teaching (that) included significant negative evidence." The student course union had not been consulted nor were any students.

Perhaps letters of complaint were received by the math department and never shown to Mather, Mather said.

Prof "X" tells his students that he is paid to teach from 9 to 10. He does not want to see any students at all outside of class. The students write a letter of complaint to the department.

When the professor came up for tenure, the letter was not presented to the committee and the professor was granted tenure. (The question is not whether letters of complaint should be considered but whether the tenure committee fairly assessed teaching ability in either case.)

Teaching can even be held against a professor. One reason for denying tenure to Professor "D" was that he was "too susceptible to accepting teaching loads." In other words, he taught too much. Students rated him an excellent professor.

A minority on the Forster committee, whose report on recommendations for tenure was released in August, said "In general students do not possess the necessary maturity of judgement and knowledge of and commitment to the committee by tenured members of the teaching staff."

The Forster report did not even credit that maturity to non-tenured professors. Untenured professors in their late-20's or 30's who have written PhD's are not competent to sit on tenure committees, according to the report.

"Necessary experienced judgement" allows tenured faculty to continue running tenure committees. No student claims competence to judge a professor's research but tenured professors claim competence to judge teaching ability, without ever seeing a professor teach or asking his students about his skills.

You had mention their names, didn't you? Tenure committees need their anonymity. Decisions without recriminations retires.

According to the Forster report tenure is designed "to protect the process of free inquiry."

Who is eligible for tenure? All assistant professors come up for tenure, usually after five years at the university. Associate professors not granted tenure upon hiring come up for tenure within three years. Lecturers are not eligible for tenure. Full professors generally already have tenure.

his specialized field.

Usually the professor does not know who is sitting on the committee, when or where the committee meets, or what evidence is being presented before the committee. The committee does not ask him to appear before it.

After a month or so he receives a letter telling him whether the committee has granted him tenure or not. The letter gives him no reasons for the decision.

Wish you were here

Remember the "How I spent my summer vacation" essay you used to write the first week back in school? Well, now Scarborough professors are writing brief accounts of "How I spent my research leave" for the Scarborough College Bulletin.

In the first installment of this new series, (Volume 2, Number 4) Political Science professor Edward Andrew wrote how he researched "the subject of leisure" in the British Museum during his sojourn in London.

Dean S.J. Colman, also a professor of political science, spent his sab-atical leave in Oxford and Paris, studying French interpretations of Nietzsche. However, Colman first visited Ticino Italy, and spent Easter in Verona Ravenna, and Yugoslavia, inspecting Roman ruins.

History professor John Kenyon spent his leave in England, although he doesn't say where, studying the work of R.W. Dale, a militant congregationalist minister from Birmingham who had "a great sense of commitment to the community in which he lived."

We assume that a good time was had by all.

"OK, Mugsy, I'll gib ya da scoop on who's on da tenya committee, but if de prez finds out, kiss me goodbye."

Where student parity went

By DICK BROWN

"Students do not possess the necessary maturity of judgment, and knowledge of and commitment to the discipline that would be brought to the (tenure) committee by tenured members of the teaching staff."

In a few terse words, the report of the task force to review policy and procedures on academic appointments dismisses the notion of student participation in tenure decisions.

The task force, headed by university vice-president and provost Don Forster, issued its long-awaited report in August, and the report is as vague in some areas as it is specific in others while at the same time overlooking some of the key issues surrounding the tenure debate.

Committee structure not clear

The issue of who should sit on the departmental committees deciding tenure is never really settled in the report.

After explaining in detail four possible committee structures, the task force reported it was unable to arrive at any clear guideline.

Instead, some vague notions were presented, such as:

- "the tenure committee should be of the 'decadal' type with the members acting in a quasi-judicial fashion weighting the written evidence bearing on the candidate's accomplishments and qualities. . . ."

- the committees should be as small as possible;

- there should be "some academic administrators and extra-departmental members" on the committee;

- in multi-departmental divisions, there should be a strong departmental influence in the committee;

- and no students should be on the committees, although the report indicates "views in the university community are strongly held and perhaps irreconcilable" on that point.

With no clear recommendations on this key point, the task force in effect passes the buck back to university president John Evans and the Governing Council for a decision, when many had were under the supervision of the candidate. But their main problem is in how to select the students to sit on the committees and the criteria to be used.

That argument prevailed, apparently, for the report dismisses student participation not because students would be so ill-qualified (although a minority of the task force felt that way), but because there would be no way to select "qualified" students to ensure that only "qualified" students were chosen.

Unfortunately, the report never defined exactly what the task force thought would be a "qualified" student.

Even more unfortunate was the omission of any discussion about how to select qualified faculty or administrators on the tenure committees or any fleeting reference as to what a qualified faculty member might be.

In fact, the only discussion of the calibre of members of tenure committees occurred with the discussion of students. Faculty, administration and lay persons were not subjected to any scrutiny of "qualifications" and selection criteria.

Tenure justified?

The task force consisted of six faculty members, two students, two university administrators and a member of the university governing council.

The task force accepts the age-old reasons for why there should be tenure in the first place. It spends two pages describing why "tenure seems to us to be the best method so far devised to recognize and protect the autonomy and integrity of the scholar's pursuit of knowledge."

It also indicates tenure is a form of job security superior to other professional job security

- persistent neglect of, or reasonable duties assigned academic authority;

- inability to carry out except where the inability is making the staff person eligible for dismissal;

- failure to maintain reasonable standards of his or her discipline;

- gross misconduct.

At best the categories are have no say in initiating procedure — it is all done by administrators and senior academic officers.

Dismissal for cause must be approved by the dean of a faculty, director of a school, and be approved by the board of trustees before a hearing could be held to recommend.

While all the bureaucratic procedures for cause are spelled out, it would work in practice is an instructor or professor, an unheard-of practice in the case of T senior officials would know if so inclined.

Publish or perish still alive

Should the task force become university policy, it publish or perish to attain tenure with only token consideration of other qualifications.

The task force suggests the judgment in the granting of tenure dismisses a fourth.

The Forster report wasn't a lot of things, including a bombshell.

hoped the task force might be less equivocal.

The equivocation, however, indicates just how little consensus there still is on the issue of how to handle the granting of tenure.

The waffling by the 11-member task force on the student participation question is a good case in point.

Factions split committee

After conceding that students would respect the confidential nature of a tenure committee's discussions and that there, in fact, are students with the "intellectual capacity and judgement" to sit on such a committee, the task force breaks down into two un-named factions.

The first faction makes the now-common argument that students on tenure committees would be able "to ensure adequate evaluation of a candidate's effectiveness in teaching."

The opposing faction claims this is a conflict of interest if the student were taking a course or schemes because tenure is "more difficult to obtain and possibly more absolute in the protection it guarantees," although the task force points out that "is by no means the primary objective of tenure."

While an interesting capsule resume of the traditional reasons for tenure, no where does the report indicate that tenure does anything for the quality of teaching done by the tenured professor.

Student complaints that it is impossible to fire an incompetent tenured professor may not be quelled with the bureaucratic structure the task force proposes for "dismissal for cause" — the only vehicle which the task force proposes as a check against arbitrary action by tenured teaching staff.

The task force recommends changing the Hailst rules for dismissal for cause by redefining cause to mean one of four categories:

"Achievement in research, teaching and clear promotion and professional development are the three scales tenure is based on."

The report eliminates "university and community service" as the most part irrelevant because it is too much time and energy spent on it.

"A significant weighting of research could encourage young scholars to spend too much time and energy on research when they should be focusing on their primary research."

Yet the task force report gives little guidance on how to measure a candidate's effectiveness in either teaching or potential intellectual growth, leaving the only quantifiable criteria for tenure that of research, which is of course quantifiable in as much as publication is measurable.

The report concedes defeat in how to assess a candidate teaching ability by explaining:

"The great variety in size and kind of divisions and departments, the great range of degrees of affiliation or association of students with divisions and departments and the great differences in degree of student involvement in divisional and departmental affairs which characterize this university, all defeat any attempt to be precise in our recommendations as to how assessment of teaching ability should be carried out in order to produce meaningful information for the tenure committee."

The report does not even bother to get into a discussion of how to assess a candidate's potential ability, and one is left wondering just how future potential is assessed.

But in the finest tradition of publish or perish, the task force gives detailed recommendations of who should read the candidate's published works and whether or not an honorarium should be paid for the effort.

Possibly with an eye to the recent backlog of appeals of no-tenure decisions, the report urges that the university vice-president and provost set up a committee to review automatically all decisions by tenure committees.

The review committee would have the authority to refer a decision by the tenure committee back to that committee for further consideration.

It is here, at the review committee level that the task force finally allows some token student participation, but students would be able to be outvoted in any event.

Follow the yellow brick road

The standard path to getting tenure was outlined by the report. Initially a person would be hired as an assistant professor for a two-year contract.

At the expiry of that contract, a new contract of up to three years could be made. No tenure consideration could be made without three years of experience, but a decision on tenure would have to be made by the fifth year at the university.

The candidate would be notified in writing that he was being considered for tenure but would not be allowed to appear before the committee considering his tenure.

The task force explained the in camera hearings this way:

"A minority of members of the task force believe that an interview with the candidate should be a mandatory part of the committee's procedures. They feel that the committee would likely receive further information and that it is desirable for a candidate to speak on his or her own behalf.

"A majority of the task force are convinced that an interview with the candidate would only complicate the committee's procedures and not add significantly to the written information and assessments required to be before the committee."

No where does the task force address itself to the possibility that an interview with the candidate might assist it in assessing the candidates teaching ability (which the report concedes cannot be done properly) or his future potential (which the candidate might be able to explain himself).

Should a candidate be turned down for tenure and the initial vice-presidential review committee confirms the rejection, the task force recommends the establishment of a special presidential review committee to handle the appeals.

Criteria for appeal

This seven-member panel consisting of faculty and administrators, but no students, would decide if the president decides one of three criteria for appeal existed.

- The three criteria are:
- improper bias or motive on the part of any member or members of the tenure committee;
- significant irregularity in the procedure followed by the decanal tenure committee;
- whether the decision of the (original tenure) committee seems inconsistent with the standards and practices of that division or other academic divisions of the university.

The special review committee would then meet in camera with the appellant allowed to be present and give evidence himself, but he would not be allowed to call any witnesses nor cross-examine them unless the special committee allows him to do so.

How the task force arrived at the name of "quasi-judicial" for this kind of proceeding is not mentioned in the report.

Lay-offs likely

Buried in the middle of the task force report are their recommendations for a contingency plan to lay-off tenured teaching staff in case the money runs out.

After a brief rubric that "this action undermines the concept of tenure," the report continues in the same sentence saying: "The Canadian Association of University Teachers does recognize the possibility of such termination under certain conditions."

The report goes on to outline in exhaustive detail the stress placed on the finances of the university should student enrolment continue on the decline.

The report urges every possible alternative in budget slashing be pursued prior to dismissal of teaching staff, but if necessary then it is necessary.

The only ameliorative measures the report suggests are that the university president sees if staff could be re-located in another university, particularly in Ontario, professors be allowed to retire early with no loss of pension, and at least 12 months notice of lay-off.

However, again the report fails to discuss such alternates as professors taking a cut in pay (as certain PhDs in the Clarke Institute have done to preserve their jobs), or putting professors on a part-time basis with part time pay on the understanding they would come back to full time when the money comes back in.

A strong minority position however, disagrees with the whole notion of a contingency plan to dismiss staff for financial reasons.

Charging the idea is an "abrogation of tenure," the unnamed minority says such dismissal "could have a deleterious effect on university morale."

"Demoralization would result from the injustice which would become apparent with the first dismissal for fiscal reasons of an able and conscientious tenured faculty member," the minority says.

"Dismissal for fiscal reasons violates the contractual relationship between the university and the staff member which a tenured appointment has generally and traditionally been assumed to mean — that such a staff member can be dismissed before normal retirement age only for cause."

"It would, perhaps, be appropriate were the teaching staff unionized," the minority observed. "Adoption of the recommended policy (of the majority) may indeed do much to further such a development."

Ancient tenure ritual shows professor being assessed: if he sinks, he is granted tenure, but if he floats he is a heretic and denied tenure.

Survival of world not terribly urgent

By DAVID SIMMONDS

The Draft Canadian Plan for Survival has been referred to as "very reasonable" by one of its authors. Indeed, it makes no claim that any action must be taken by a certain date as the recent British "Blueprint for Survival" did.

The Canadian plan, released at a press conference held last week at Hart House, was conceived by a group called the Survival Institute of Canada, which was formed following the 1972 United Nations conference in Stockholm on the human environment. The institute then organized the "Group of 50" several of whom are U of T faculty members, to draft the survival plan.

The body of the plan separates seven major areas of concern: pollution, population, urban problems, and transportation, socio-economic policies, resource management, and education.

Pollution, says the plan, is "not, in theory, hard to deal with," although the authors claim that legislation so far has been "discretionary and vague". The plan endorses the Environmental Bill of Rights, proposed by the Canadian Environmental Law Association, and discusses several specific pollution problems.

With regard to population, the plan recommends a policy of stabilization, with "fertility maintained at or below a 2.1 replacement level" (replacing for two deaths 2.1 births). It recommends a total maximum immigration quota, and the establishment of a federal population commission to develop policy, followed by a population council to enforce it.

In the area of urban problems, the report suggests carrying capacity studies for Canadian cities, along with economic incentives for relocation. The plan calls for a Canadian transport policy, with specific attention to extensive rail passenger service.

The plan discusses some specific Canadian problems. These include regional disparities, which make establishment of national environmental guidelines difficult; northern development; control of offshore waters; and concern for native peoples. An important recommendation of the plan is that Canada align herself with the resource producing nations, rather than the major powers.

The plan makes several recommendations in the area of social, economic and political policies and their implications. It calls for preferential treatment for the developing countries, with those countries able to establish their own priorities. At least 1 per cent, and later 2 per cent, of GNP should be allocated to developing countries, says the report.

In the area of domestic policy, the plan demands a "thorough review of the entire principle of consumerism", with national priorities geared instead to "husbandry of natural resources."

The authors of the report also call for greater public access to decision making, which should be geared to long-term planning, for Canadian control of industries located in Canada.

The question of resource management is extensively discussed in the report. In general, the draft plan calls for broader resource controls, for the licensing of renewable resources, and the establishment of priorities for the use of non-renewable resources. The concept of the "throw-away society", says the report, must end.

The plan claims that "it is essential that Canada establish a far-sighted energy policy". This would involve precise determination of both need and supply, a lowering of energy consumption, and a search for both efficient and new energy technologies.

The plan calls it "immoral" for Canada not to produce food to its capacity. "Sooner or later, we believe Canadians must turn increasingly to vegetable sources of protein...this would permit Canada to make a much greater contribution to world protein needs than at present". The report asks Canadians to reduce their food consumption. Two other important recommendations include the development of protein from oil and natural gas sources, and the creation of a world protein bank, administered through the UN.

The final section of the draft plan deals with education. "It is essential that a finer, more informed sensibility of these complex problems be deployed at all levels of society" states the report. It suggests that a "society-wide crash education program of unprecedented proportions" is needed.

It should be emphasized that not all of the recommendations in the "Draft Canadian Plan for Survival" are covered here. However, we have tried to list the major issues covered in the report.

Next week, a four-day hearing will be held in the auditorium of the Toronto Board of Education, where the public, both individuals and groups, can present their views on the deterioration of the global environment, and survival.

Sun wants filler

The Sunday Sun, Toronto's newest addition to tabloid "journalism", phoned the Varsity office Thursday to find out what happened to those grand old campus radicals of yesteryear.

"Where are they now, and what are they doing?" was the inquiry.

A good question, so the only logical answer possible was given: try the Student Administrative Council.

We hope the Sun gets the story. The Varsity would also like to know what happened to those grand old radicals at SAC.

We might suggest a better story for the Sun to pursue, however. What ever happened to those grand old right-wingers at the Tely? We really would like to know.

U of T too dirty

By PAUL MICELI

Did you know that at this minute you are being "polluted" by liberal, permissive ideas? Yes, it's true, and the longer you've been here at the university the dirtier you are. Consider yourself warned by Rabbi Jacob J. Hecht, who made the comment last Wednesday.

He spoke at a taping of the CHCH-TV series Under Attack at the Academic Building of Victoria University. Hecht is the head of one of the largest synagogues in the US, a noted campaigner against pornography and permissiveness and leader of the campaign to have the television show Bridget Loves Bernie cancelled.

Hecht aroused the audience with his phenomenally conservative views. He justified his campaign against Bridget Loves Bernie by arguing that it encouraged intermarriage between Jews and gentiles. This, he argued, amounts to a sellout of faith. Furthermore, he said, two faiths cannot live together in a marriage situation.

Hecht answered most of the questions straightforwardly but showed great skill in avoiding questions that he didn't like.

For example a student panelist, Howard Stein, quoted an article written by Hecht about black housing. In it Hecht referred to blacks as "cry babies". Hecht replied by reminding the audience how much Jews have aided blacks in the civil rights movement. He also said something about a man having the right to choose his own neighbors, but he failed to answer the question directly.

The next guest at the CHCH filming was Father Arthur Gibson, chairman of the religious studies department of St. Michael's College. The voice-over at the start of the show introduced Gibson as a man who defended the Spanish Inquisition, Franco's takeover of Spain, and the church doctrine of papal infallibility.

His views were not as extreme as CHCH-TV implied.

Gibson once referred to "liberal kooks" within the church, yet some of his views were quite liberal. He implied that the birth control issue has been overplayed by its critics. Regarding celibacy, he said that he had no objection to married priests. He even went as far as to advocate women in the priesthood.

Some of Gibson's responses sounded questionable to the audience. One member of the audience questioned him about the conflict in Northern Ireland. He said that, without wishing to sound flippant, it was the fault of Satan.

Television viewers will be able to see these shows within the next five weeks on Thursday nights.

Native centre helps Indians new to city

By BETH STEWART

Too often, native Canadians arrive in Toronto from the reservations seeking a better life, only to be overwhelmed by the adjustment from rural to urban living. The Indian is faced with a change of scene, a change of life-style, and a sudden emphasis on money.

For 10 years now, the Centre for Native Canadians, at 210 Beverley Street, has been a place in Toronto for such Indians to go. Originally a referral centre, today it offers financial assistance, placement services, or just an understanding friend.

However, the Centre has been "catering to men for the first 10 years," says Mrs. Redman, the director. She feels that, in order for the Centre to make the most out of its funds, it should turn its attention more towards mothers and children. The family, then, has become the Centre's first priority since Redman became director last November.

She says it is the mothers who leave the reservations to bring their children to the city where they hope they will receive a better education than can be found at home.

Day Care services are offered, and the Centre hopes to establish a nursery to take care of infants while mothers attend home economics classes to learn how to manage a home in the city.

With an estimated 100 Indian students in Toronto high schools, the Centre is turning its attention more towards youth as well. Classes are held in language, dance and beading. Tutoring in school work is also given.

The Centre hosts many social activities for the Indian community. Senior citizens gather on Wednesday afternoons. Banquets and wine and cheese parties are held.

The Centre publishes a monthly newspaper, the Toronto Native Times, which is filled with information for and about Indians. The paper is sent to the reservations so that the Indians there can keep up to date on what is happening in the Indian community in the city.

Redman emphasizes that "Indians are on the bottom of the economic totem pole." Most are on welfare or mother's allowance. The Centre must therefore rely entirely on outside donations.

Lights will end perilous journey to Vic, SMC

A traffic light will finally be installed on the west side of Queen's Park Crescent, so the thousands of students who cross it daily will no longer have to dodge the fast moving traffic.

The proposal was recommended by the City — U of T Liaison Committee at City Hall last Wednesday after a deputation from Victoria University demanded some kind of action by the committee.

A Victoria residence don, David Pelteret, pointed out that hundreds of students living in Victoria College and St. Michael's College residences had to cross Queen's Park several times a day, especially since the campus centre of gravity has shifted to the St. George area, where the science buildings and new library are located.

Pelteret suggested several alternatives which would facilitate crossing the crescent in the Hart House area — a bridge, traffic lights, or a tunnel.

Following the presentation by the Vic delegation, one of whom had recently been injured, Ward 6 Alderman William Archer, who is co-chairman with President John Evans of the liaison committee, presented a full-blown scheme for a new light at the corner of Hoskins and Queen's Park Crescent, that would not allow right turns on the red light. Students would have a free stretch of road to cross over to Queen's Park, south of Hoskins, since the road is one-way.

Archer pointed out it would cost about between $6,000 and $7,000, and could be done without a detailed study or a long wait. According to Archer's schedule it would take only a few weeks for the City and Metro levels of government to review the request. The City's Public Works committee is considering the recommendation today.

The main problem the light presents is the back up of traffic along Hoskins to where a pedestrian light allows students to cross between Hart House and Trinity a few hundred feet away.

The Archer solution follows a facetious letter on the crosswalk subject sent by Ward 6's other Alderman, Dan Heap, to committee members in the summer. Heap pointed out how the liaison committee had successfully managed to make no decision about the crescent crossing for quite a number of years.

Although the liaison committee cannot make decisions which are binding on the city and the university, it can make recommendations. Last May representatives from local ratepayer and residents groups were included on the committee, and there will undoubtedly be more pressure for recommendations to be carried out.

The liaison committee, which has been noted most for its infrequent meetings in the past, will be meeting next month to consider the crucial matter of parking at the university. A recent report from Public Works Commissioner Ray Bremner points out that the university and the provincial government complexes in the midtown area provide cheap downtown parking for employees, thus attracting more cars during congested rush-hour periods.

The committee requested that the university produce its report on parking at the next meeting. Both the Metro and City governments are considering restricting all-day downtown parking by charging prohibitive rates. On the average, the U of T employee pays only 30 to 60 cents per day, as compared to a $2.50 daily rate downtown.

ATHLETICS POLICY: U of T STUDENTS PAY THE PIPER BUT DON'T CALL THE TUNE

Students now pay more than 50 per cent of the operating costs for men's athletics programs at U of T. The money is taken from tuition fees.

Students have also paid most of the construction of Varsity Stadium and Varsity Arena by buying tickets to hockey and football games through the years.

But students have only 7 seats of the 20-member Men's Athletic Directorate which governs sport programs and administers facilities. Of the seven, four represent intercollegiate athletics; only two represent participants in intramural athletic programs.

On the Women's Directorate, students now have a majority of seats. Most of these students represent intramural athletics.

The U of T administration wants to unify the Men's and Women's Directorates at a time when it is planning major expenditure for new athletic facilities.

On Oct. 17 and 18 students will be asked in a referendum: "DO YOU SUPPORT THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A STUDENT MAJORITY ON A UNIFIED DIRECTORATE GOVERNING MEN'S AND WOMEN'S ATHLETICS AT THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO?"

In the referendum students will also be asked their opinions about:

OF TENURE, PROMOTION AND DISMISSAL OF FACULTY MEMBERS.
AND U of T MEMBERSHIP IN THE NATIONAL UNION OF STUDENTS

Now, students, let's play double jeopardy!

EDMONTON (CUP) — Students at the University of Alberta are to be disciplined under a system of double jeopardy.

Many of the offences on which the university's new discipline hearing board may rule are also covered by Canadian law. A student is, therefore, liable to punishment for the same offence.

The recently-approved Discipline, Law and Order Report, which sets the guidelines for the board, does not, however, clearly define an "offence". For example, such crimes as mental indignities may also be included.

The report states that, although "any person" may bring action against any student whom he considers to have committed an offence, only students may stand accused before the board. Ignored are those offences committed by faculty or administration members against students.

Patrick Delaney, Students Union VP, called the report "somewhat reactionary". He said in a Student Council meeting, that the Hearing Board was nothing more than a "kangaroo court". The Student Council had previously voted to condemn the report.

The report itself is the result of the deliberations of a Committee on Discipline, Law, and Order created in 1969. The U of A administration had been worried about repercussions on the campus from student actions at Simon Fraser University, the University of BC and various campuses in the USA in the late sixties.

Max Wyman, president of the University, seems anxious to obscure the issue. He insisted in an interview that it was not a question of double jeopardy but of "double jurisdiction". He did not, however, comment on what the practical difference would be to a student facing two trials and two punishments for one offence.

Gary Draper, a Faculty of Arts student representative on the committee approving the report, said that the Campus Law Review Committee is still studying controversial sections of the Law and Order report. Many of the recommendations of the report would not represent a major departure from present university regulations, he claimed.

Tennis team to final

By IAN GRIFFIN

The Varsity Blues Tennis Team defeated Queen's and Carleton on the weekend to win the OUAA Eastern section and move into the finals at Western this coming Friday. The Blues posted a 10-2 record in the two-day meet played on the EIGHT NEW concrete courts behind the stadium in Kingston.

Blues' No. 1, Keith Porter, defeated Carleton's Murray Whitaker, 6-3 6-7 6-2, but lost to Queen's Paul Lukey, 7-6 4-6 6-4; Lukey will thus represent the Eastern section in the battle for OUAA individual honours. Blues' other team members, Heino Lents, Ross Saldan, and Ian Griffin, won all their singles matches; the only other varsity loss came in a then-unimportant doubles match to Queen's.

It is quite evident that the level of tennis, in Ontario generally, and throughout the OUAA is improving; and it is regrettable that Laurentian, upset victor over York in the first round of the playdowns on Sept. 30, was not able to make it to Kingston. Nevertheless, the Blues are in the capable hands of Coach Don Steele and appear to have a good shot at repeating as league champions.

Blues whip Waterloo to stay in contention

By PAUL CARSON

The playoff picture for the football Blues brightened considerably over the weekend thanks to the defending OUAA champions Laurier Golden Hawks who edged Ottawa 19-16 while Blues delighted a sparse Thanksgiving Weekend crowd of about 3,000 by trampling Waterloo 48-0 at the Stadium.

Coupled with Queens 21-13 victory over Carleton, the results have created a three-way tie atop the OUAA eastern division as Blues, Ottawa and Queens each have six points. But the latter two teams have played one less game than Varsity.

However, despite their 39-37 loss to Windsor two weeks ago, Blues can still grab first place—but to do so they must win all their three remaining games which just happen to be against three of the best teams—Western, Queens and Ottawa.

This Saturday's match in London could be the most important since Western were held to a 7-7 tie last week by Windsor and could now have problems winning the western division should they lose to Blues as well. For Varsity there is no question of could or maybes: Blues must win all three remaining games or the season ends after the Ottawa visit to the Stadium on Oct. 27.

The Varsity - Brian Pei

Dave Flavell (62) and Mark Sazio (63) rush hapless Waterloo quarterback in crushing 48-0 victory.

The other local media have already commented at length on Saturday's methodical destruction of Waterloo, so it's unlikely that anybody on campus doesn't know what happened.

Quite simply, Blues played an almost text-book perfect game against a larger but slower and less talented opponent, and but for some liberal use of substitutes in the second half the score could easily have been much higher.

Offensively, the statistics were overwhelming. A fantastic total offence of 626 yards made up of 211 yards along the ground and 425 yards passing.

Both quarterbacks, veteran Wayne Dunkley and freshman Al Brenchley, successfully picked apart the feeble Waterloo pass defence and Dunkley also started Blues' scoring parade with a one-yard run as Varsity took the opening kickoff and calmly marched down the field in 17 plays that consumed just over seven minutes.

As for the passing attack, Dunkley completed 11 of 15 for 205 yards while Brenchley was slightly better with 14 of 17 for 211. Each produced three touchdown passes as Dunkley connected twice with Cor Doret and then lofted a perfect 68-yard bomb to flanker Henry Tobias before leaving the game in the third quarter.

Brenchley finished the game in grand style with scoring passes to Brent Elsey, rookie John Fenn and sophomore Esteban Andryjowicz.

Defensively, Blues were equally impressive, holding Waterloo to only 160 total yards including a meagre 50 via passing as the Varsity secondary came up with by far its best display of the current season.

Blues' domination of the scoring and statistics overshadowed another area where Blues were totally in control, namely the line play. Offensively, this year's line was supposed to be somewhat weak due to relatively small size and problems created by graduation of experienced players from last year's squad.

However, Blues coaching staff filled the holes by switching Jim Nicoletti from defensive end to center, installing Nick Grittani at one tackle spot, and moving Dave Quick from tight end to the other tackle position. Coupled with returnees Bruce Parrack, Charlie Wright and Andryjowicz, the revamped line show promise of finally rounding into shape.

Defensively, only tackle Ken Hussey is back from last year, but new additions Glenn Rosborough, Dave Flavell and Lubemir Alexov all played exceptionally well last week.

Sudbury soccer saw-off hurts play-off shot

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues travelled north to Sudbury over the weekend and played two 1-1 ties against the Laurentian Voyageurs. The results disappointed the Blues in their attempt to overhaul the league-leading Sudbury team, whom they trail by one point.

On Saturday both teams opened slowly and few goalmouth incidents occurred at either end. Peter Hillier was assigned to mark the Vee's chief playmaker, former professional Bruno Pilas.

With only six minutes played the Sudbury squad took a surprise lead. The Vees moved the ball adroitly in midfield, but some 25 yards from goal Walter Doret met a solid wall of Toronto defenders and decided to shoot. The ball bounced awkwardly in front of goalkeeper Bob Judd, glanced up and cannoned off his shoulder into the top right corner of the net.

The Toronto players immediately showed their resilience by clamping a determined grip on the game. The Vees' defence showed a tendency to crack under the continued pressure but was not punished for this into the path of a Blues' attacker, but neither Dave Evans nor Vince Ierullo was able to apply the finishing touch.

By far the best chance accrued from an incisive play built up in midfield. As Iain Slimmon and Evans exchanged passes, Allen Caramancio and Ierullo moved to their right, thus drawing two defenders out of the middle. Noting this, Evans quickly directed a ground pass to Vito Polera who had moved at speed into the vacant area. He advanced straight on goal but, to the amazement of the Vees' goalie Vic Pessot, shot wide of the right post.

For the first 15 minutes of the second half the Blues surrendered control of the centre and consequently came under severe pressure.

Gradually the balance of play swung back in Blues' favor.

With five minutes to play Jim Varelus hit a corner kick close to the Sudbury net. Although the host goalkeeper pushed him in the back, Geoff Crew headed a pass across the goal which Joe Savarino headed into the net. Inexplicably, the referee cancelled the score.

Enraged by this decision, the Blues pressed forward relentlessly. With two minutes remaining, the deserved equalizer was scored. A barrage of shots on the Voyageurs' net was cleared and the ball collected by Slimmon. His high cross was met by John Cobby, who angled a headed pass between two defenders and into the path of Elvy Zanette; his coolly-struck shot was unstoppable.

The following day's game started cautiously due to the teams' respect for each other. A clear chance for Polera failed when he drew back before shooting and let the goalkeeper beat him to the ball.

The Blues conceded the first goal after 20 minutes. Slack covering by the Toronto left defence on a throw-in allowed Mike Czerwinc to break clear. His shot, taken from an acute angle, found the far corner of the net.

Blues evened the tally almost immediately. Burns received the ball in midfield and slotted a perfect low pass to Ierullo. He outran the defence and unhesitatingly shot past the diving keeper, who had advanced too slowly from his net.

Sudbury now became more concerned about preserving a tie and placed a man permanently in Burns' shadow. For a while the Toronto players had difficulty in adjusting to this changed situation, but eventually they were able to exert control again by utilizing the overlapping abilities of the defence.

Now that second successive stalemate loomed as a distinct possibility, the players of both teams became frustrated; the Blues with the officiating and the Vees with the unaccustomed lack of success. Under these conditions, and with exhaustion becoming a dominant factor, the Toronto squad continued to try for the winning goal, but without the precision necessary to break open the determined defence of a strong Laurentian team.

Both games were excellent examples of hard-fought college soccer in a league that is becoming more competitive every year. Laurentian coach Greg Zorbas, who has recruited a solid team possessing considerable skill, expressed relief that this squad had retained its unbeaten record in the two crucial weekend games.

Free kicks... Blues coach Bob Nicol was disgusted with, in his opinion, the home bias of the officials...with five games still to play Blues are still in contention, but only the top team makes the cut...the attempt of the McMaster coach, Bill Knox to have Voyageurs' Bruno Pilas ruled ineligible appears doomed — Mac lost twice in Sudbury...Blues visit Guelph next, hoping to avenge an earlier 1-1 upset tie

Rugby Blues firsts and seconds rout RMC

By JAMES MacDONALD

The first XV came away with a big 23-6 win over RMC on Saturday afternoon on the back campus. In a game marked by aggressive and rough play the Blues displayed determination and tenacity.

When the Redmen kicked off to Toronto, there were more than four major changes evident on the Blue's team, yet no real handicap was apparent. The game quickly developed into a battle between the packs as RMC forwards showed a great deal of hustle as well as great effort in the scrums and line-outs.

More than once the "Reddys" threatened but it was the Blues who picked up the first points as Dave Amborski made a 25 yard penalty kick good for a 3-0 lead.

It was only a short time later that Amborski again went into action and increased the lead to 6-0 as he connected on a 20 yard penalty kick.

The half continued with more hard play as breakthroughs by each team were repulsed by good punting and rough defensive play.

However the Redmen were able to tie the game on two penalty kicks, the first from 30 yards out and the second from 35.

Then, just before half-time, a scuffle broke out after a line-out.

As a result of this RMC forward left the game for the hospital with an undetermined injury to his face.

Needless to say this fired up his team more than ever and both sides were glad to hear the whistle.

The start of the second half showed no great change in the style of the game although Amborski gave Toronto a 9-6 lead early in the half from a 30 yard penalty. However the Blues began to show superiority in the scrums which their backs took advantage of to gain good field position a number of times. Yet consistently excellent line-out work by RMC, along with other tough defensive work staved off each threat. In fact a number of times the Redmen almost broke through the Blues on loose field running and punting and fullback Bruce Waygood was called on to make several crucial defensive plays. More than half way through the second period the first try was scored. Wing forward Neil Sorbie blocked an RMC 25 drop-out and in a great follow-up carried the ball to within 5 yards of the goal-line where he passed off to "Crazy-Horse" Kitchen who had no trouble diving in for the 4 points. Amborski converted the try to make it 15-6.

From this point on Toronto showed great style as they dominated everything but the line-outs. With 15 minutes to go Randy Filinski bulled his way for more than 25 yards to cross the goal-line but no try was awarded as a number of Redmen also had their hands on the ball. This disappointment was soon forgotten however as a penalty was awarded to Toronto during the ensuing 5 yard scrum. Amborski rumbled the first few yards and then passed off to Filinski who dove in for the score. The try was not converted and the Blues were ahead 19-6. With five minutes left Kitchen sealed it up as he scrambled 30 yards down the side-line, breaking a number of tackles on the way, to score in the corner to make the final 23-6.

This win was crucial for the Blues as it revived their spirits after last Wednesday's defeat at York. Also it keeps their championship chances entirely in their own hands and they do not have to have another team win for them.

Rugby Blues kept their title hopes burning with a 23-6 win over RMC on the back campus Saturday.

The second XV kept their unbeaten streak alive as they put down RMC 22-12 on Saturday. Although there were many changes on the second XV as well, the team played well as a unit with the bonus of numerous individual efforts.

The first half was high-lighted by great work in the Blues pack, which continually won the ball for the backs to work with. The Toronto team was denied any points until Bruce Carroll kicked a 25 yard penalty for 3 points. Only minutes later Carroll narrowly missed a 40 yard and then a 30 yard kick. The Blues pack continued to press hard but was unable to score after three successive 5 yard scrums. A penalty finally enabled RMC to clear. Again Toronto returned and Carroll was able to make it 6-0 off another penalty kick. The Redmen did not lag and from the kick-off drove deep into the Blues half. They kicked a penalty goal from 20 yards out to narrow the gap. The Blues then seemed to decide it was their turn and pushed back RMC on a series of rucks. The Redmen were not to be outdone and a quick stab on a loose run gave them good position and eventually 3 points to tie the game from a penalty goal 30 yards out. In the few minutes remaining the Blues' pack again showed their strength and carried the ball down to within 5 yards of the Redmen's goal-line. Here they were awarded a penalty and prop Tom Cullen took the ball over for 4 points. The half ended with Toronto ahead 10-6.

It was early in the second half when George Zajczek, after a move from a long line-out throw, broke through to score under the posts and get a try which was then converted by Carroll to make it 16-6 for Blues. The only other Blues score came when Cullen scored again, after he picked up a loose ball and went in close to the posts. Carroll again converted the try and Toronto was ahead by 16 points, 22-6. Although the Blues did threaten several more times they were unable to capitalize and the only other points came when the Redmen kicked two penalty goals to leave the final score at 22-12.

Both teams have now played every team in the division except Queen's, whom they meet in Kingston next Saturday afternoon. Both teams should be at full strength by then and demonstrate their true power.

Artistic rally asks support

By BOB BETTSON

The next few days on the picket line at Artistic Woodwork will be crucial to the success of the seven-week-old strike according to union organizer John Lang.

Lang was speaking to a SAC-sponsored rally yesterday called to gain support for the increasingly bitter struggle at the North York plants between the strikers and their supporters on one hand, and management and Metro police on the other.

Lang said that negotiations with management had just opened up yesterday and there is no indication that a settlement is imminent. He told the audience that the strike was "very important in bringing to public attention the plight of immigrant workers, working in sweat shops without the basic rights of human dignity and job security."

The prominent role of the police in the strike has "not been our choosing," Lang said. He charged that the conditions imposed are worse than under an injunction and the union has not had the opportunity to go before the courts.

"This is a militant strike and it's all the more important that the strike be won. We must match the company and not be afraid of arrests or bullying", he said.

Union local president Joe Sinagoga won a round of applause from the audience after his warm appeal for support. "We need more people, if we have lots of picketers we are strong. The company is scared, and if they see more people we will win."

Sinagoga appealed for more support at 6:30 am each weekday morning at the plant on Densley avenue near Keele and Lawrence in North York.

Waffler Mel Watkins compared the strike to "union busting efforts in the 30's." He said that it was typical of many small plants in Toronto which draw on large numbers of immigrant workers and give them low wages with no protection.

Watkins charged that "police are setting a new record for arrests. But the number on the picket line have grown. With Tuesday's big turnout the police had much more difficulty." (So far 60 people have been arrested.)

He compared the situation with the Texpack strike in 1971 also involving the Chemical and Textile Workers Union. "That strike was won because it had a solid base, and workers and supporters were willing to go on the picket lines."

The Texpack strike involved the use of professional strike breakers and despite many arrests, the strike was eventually settled. The predominantly female work force won their demands.

Watkins stated the main issue

The Varsity-Chris Newell

Joe Sinagoga is asking "a favour". The next few days at Artistic will be crucial. You can help.

at Artistic was the question of union rights for workers against a management which he termed "incredibly reactionary." He appealed to students to support the workers and "show the reality of the abstract concept of a worker-student alliance."

Alderman Dan Heap explained that police had refused even to discuss complaints of brutality in response to a motion passed at city council last month.

Heap said that peace on the picket line could only be possible if cars were prevented from going through. "If strikers have the right to strike the plant should be shut down. Workers have the right under 'common law' to protect their jobs."

He maintained that this shows that "the right to strike is only there as long as people go on the picket line to prove it."

Heap cited the case of a plant in Quebec where the police were not "pro-union", and cars trying to enter a strikebound plant were stopped by police and towed away. He said it was reasonable to allow a person to enter on foot so pickets can talk to him. "But it's hard to talk to a car full of people with all windows rolled up."

With the start of negotiations, the next week is expected to be a key one in the long struggle. The strike has received growing support from other unions as well as U of T SAC and other student organizations in Toronto. Numbers on the picket lines have swelled to over 80 each morning.

Station plan unacceptable

By BRIAN CONRAD

The most recent arrangement between Metro Centre Developments Ltd. and the City of Toronto concerning the preservation of Union Station has been termed "unacceptable" by the Union Station Committee, a group which is fighting to preserve the 50-year old landmark.

The present proposal calls for the inclusion of only the Great Hall in a Metro centre office block. The rest of the station is to be demolished.

Susan Richardson, a spokeswoman for the Committee feels that "a compromise is not good enough." Union Station severed from its context as a transportation terminal, she feels, is "a pathetic excuse for meaningful preservation of a functional structure of great beauty and real importance."

The committee's stand is a simple one - Union Station should be preserved in its entirety and continue to fulfill its function as a transportation terminal. The building itself has been termed architecturally and historically significant by Toronto City Council. Buildings of such impressive scale are rare in North America. With the demolition of New York City's Penn Central Station in 1966, Union Station stands virtually alone as an example of the magnificent train stations of half a century ago. As a landmark it seems well worth preserving.

The land on which the station stands presently belongs to the City of Toronto. Metro Centre Developments Ltd. MCD, jointly controlled by Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways, plans to develop the railway yards between Yonge and Bathurst Streets. MCD feels that the erection of an office block on the Union Station site is crucial to the financial viability of the whole project.

The plan to shift Toronto's transportation terminal 500 feet further south appears to have been given rubber stamp approval by both the OMB and the Federal Transportation Commission. However upon the release of this proposal, the TTC indicated that it is not prepared to extend service to a transportation terminal any further south than Front Street.

The Union Station Committee feels that the proposal as it now stands will create massive transportation problems and inconvenience for the commuter.

The present proposal is by no means final as it will stand for ratification before City Council in a few weeks' time. It is the hope of the Union Station Committee that in the interim sufficient pressure will be brought to bear on City Council resulting in an amendment to the proposal that will insure the continued use of Union Station in its entirety as Toronto's transportation terminal.

Forster declines debate

By CHRIS PROBERT

University Vice-President Don Forster has refused an invitation from SAC President Bob Anderson to debate student representation on staffing committees.

Anderson said that "this illustrates the weakness of the arguments given in the Forster report, that Forster is not willing to defend them."

This past spring, University President John Evans set up a committee to review methods of hiring and firing at U of T, which is presently conducted by a small group of senior faculty on a department level.

In late August, the committee, headed by Forster, released its report opposing student representation on staffing committees. In the report, it was said that although many members of the committee agreed in principle with the idea of a student voice in hiring and firing, they were unable to decide on a method of selection of students to serve on staffing committees.

In response, SAC called for a committee to study this question, but, as of now, the University is uninterested.

To Anderson, "The Forster report does not deal seriously with the problems facing the university. Instead, it protects the interests of faculty, rather than those of the university as a whole."

Anderson invited Forster to debate last week, and received a phone call on Tuesday.

There will, however, be a debate on student representation on staffing committees between Anderson and Donald Ivey, Principal of New College, Monday night at 8:00 pm in the second floor lounge of Wilson Hall (the women's residence). The debate will also centre on whether there should be a student majority on the athletic directorate.

Time to round 'em up

Another truth-socking week draws to a close here at the Varg coral and it comes time to elicit possible response for our mammoth, all-new, improved, ultra-heavy Varsity staff meeting. The neatest thing about it is that you don't even have to be on the staff to come. See how friendly we are?

Today is one of the more important meetings of the year, as we have an issue of overwhelming import to discuss involving the possibility of two Varsityes a week in the future. This issue has already raised a tremendous yawn of controversy on campus, so we would like to hear any and all opinions on the matter.

As usual we will be discussing the trials, tribulations, heavens and hoes, knicks and knacks and flotsam and jetsam of our daily search for "The Big Scoop." We still need all the help we can get to put out this paper, especially reporters. So drop in at 1 pm to the office at 91 St. George St. and have a listen and a say.

PECU protests

By MARINA STRAUSS

The Political Economy Course Union plans to circulate a petition protesting the department's refusal to allow students to transfer sections in their courses.

Because some professors are more popular, students have been asked to transfer into their sections. The department refused to grant such changes to most students because of overcrowding.

When students pre-register, they are given no information about the lecturers in charge of each section. Students initially choose their section based only on the time or their college. Most first-year political science, economics, and commerce courses have section divisions.

"Course evaluations are useless if you can't follow through with them," PECU chairman Howie Stein complained.

Stein claimed that department undergraduate secretary Peter Silcox plans to flatly refuse students section changes after spring pre-registration.

Silcox confirmed this is "highly likely" if the department does not receive more money from the Arts and Science Faculty.

"If the Arts and Science Faculty dean is not ready to make money available to hire more staff, there will not only be no section changes, we will also place absolute limits on the number in each class", Silcox said.

"It's very much in the dean's hands", he added.

Stein pointed out the "horrendous situation" in ECO 200, where students were refused permission to transfer to G. Slasor's section. "Slasor is a far superior professor", Stein explained.

In ECO 100 and 200, no student was allowed to transfer sections after the first day of classes.

Stein also complained that sections of COM 100, Financial Accounting, are "massively overcrowded".

"Students were turned away by droves", he said. "It's pretty disgusting".

The department added four sections to the course a couple of weeks after classes started. "Meanwhile, hundreds of students were turned down", Stein contended.

"The department is totally ill-planned to the number of people who transfer", he said.

Soon after registration began students were not allowed into POL 102, a Canadian political issues course with just one section, Stein claimed.

"There is talk now of abolishing this course to make it easier bureaucratically", he added.

However, Silcox flatly denied any plans to scrap this course. "I'd strongly oppose such a move", he contended.

Arts and Science Faculty dean R.A. Greene admitted that "extra resources are needed for the increased demand".

Greene agreed that the Political Economy department is in need of a budget increase. He is waiting for the faculty's central budgeting committee to release next year's budget on December 4.

NUS to be topic in referendum

By BOB BETTSON

Although many U of T students may never have heard about the National Union of Students, they will be asked next week in the SAC referendum whether they want to join it. The move would cost each student 30 cents, included in the SAC fee.

According to the new union's general secretary, Bob Buckingham, the organization has been formed "to look after students' common interests at a national level and debate common problems."

NUS was formed last year after a series of meetings across the country decided that another national student organization was needed to replace the Canadian Union of Students (CUS), which folded in 1969, after U of T students voted to pull out.

Already 24 universities and colleges have joined the union and none of those who held referendums decided not to join.

The union has been set up without a hierarchy but with a national steering committee and no president. The policy-making end will be restricted to semi-annual national conventions. One of the factors in the decline of CUS was opposition to its "radical" politics.

Standing committees on financing of post-secondary education, unemployment and student housing have been set up. Buckingham said that they have already begun negotiations with the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation to lobby for better student housing policy.

The union has committed itself to trying to equalize provincial disparities in the Canada Student Loans Act to bring the poorer provinces in line with richer provinces such as Ontario.

Financing of NUS activities is through a 30-cent per student levy taken from student council fees. This is used to hire the two full time employees who work out of Ottawa and operate an information exchange including a national newsletter.

Weakness in central Canada is one of the biggest problems facing NUS; most of the present members are from the Maritimes and the west.

However the Ontario Federation of Students has agreed to support NUS and this will probably aid the fledgling organization. Some Ontario campuses have been reluctant to join because they fear duplication of effort.

Regionalism has proved the biggest barrier to the growth of NUS since its founding conference last November; Quebec observers at the meeting urged the setting up of regional not national structures.

Only three Ontario universities have joined, Lakehead, York and Carleton; but referendums are being held at other Ontario universities this fall.

Constitutionally speaking, the union's aims are to act as an agent of social change, a forum to create negotiating policy with outside organizations and a means of communication for the member institutions.

Another national conference will be held late this month in Alberta and debate will focus on the results of research done in the areas of off-campus student housing, unemployment, financing, student government and student representation on university councils and committees.

VF publicity tells you it ain't the mouthwash you use...

The Varsity Fund: No radicals please

By DAVID LINE

Chances are most U of T students have never heard of the Varsity Fund, even though they may have benefited directly from the $526,610 it raised last year.

Since its beginnings in 1961, VF has raised over $3 million from U of T alumni to be spent in areas ranging from scholarships to a host of new projects, looking for what VF people like to call "seed money".

Last year this included support for construction of "Miss Purity 11" by Applied Science and Engineering students.

It helped send the Varsity Blues Hockey Team to Poland. It sponsored Margaret Atwood as writer in residence, helped the orchestra and opera department in its performance at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa, and sent nurses to the International Congress of Nurses in Mexico City, along with a host of other projects.

According to its literature, VF is the "greatest source of unrestricted money available to the U of T", and helps to make up "the crucial difference between provincial grants and the money needed to maintain the tradition of excellence painstakingly built up through the years".

W.H. Broadhurst, chairman of the fund, explained how this money is allocated. Interested parties submit their project to U of T president John Evans, who in turn decides which ones he will recommend.

In June he takes these recommendations to the VF Board, a volunteer group of alumni that represents the association at large and votes according to their wishes. Usually they simply "rubber stamp" these recommendations, before passing them on to the Governing Council's External Affairs Committee for final approval.

This half-million dollars is not the whole of what the fund has collected in their October "Telethon". Money received from the alumni of Victoria and St. Mike's is returned to their hands.

Established scholarship programs and the alumni budgets get a first cut. The rest of the colleges and faculties will then get an amount proportional to the contributions of their alumni. This excludes Medicine and Trinity, who have their own funds.

VF expenditures are classified into five categories: scholarships and bursaries, academic research, general projects, art and literature, and a category called "contingencies" for projects that ask for assistance after the June budget has been completed.

When VF people call their money unrestricted they do not mean it is free to anyone who might desire support. Radicals of any kind, or those out of favour with the university, are unlikely to get support. In times of student unrest support for the fund declines. Such are our alumni.

Group plans to block hydro line

By LIZ MORRISON

A citizen's group calling itself Keep the Power Here (KPH) has formed to oppose a 500,000 volt power line scheduled to be built from the Douglas Point nuclear power plant to the Metro Toronto region.

Clifford Brown, former head of the provincial Liberal party's research department and KPH organizer, says the group is opposed to the method Ontario Hydro is using to draw in citizen participation.

He says Hydro is presenting citizens with a choice of where the massive hydro line is to go without allowing debate on whether Toronto needs the power in the first place.

The group's inaugural meeting is set for Sunday at 3 pm at the Cedarville Women's Institute, and Brown says the meeting will start with the assumption that Toronto "doesn't need the power" but the Bruce area will. The Douglas Point nuclear plant is part of the larger Bruce Complex located near Kincardine, Ontario, about 180 miles west and north of Toronto on the shores of Lake Huron.

In building the hydro line to Toronto, Brown says Ontario Hydro is far ahead of the provincial government in regional planning.

While the Davis government has no plan yet for the economic development of the hydro corridor, Brown says, Ontario Hydro is creating the areas where development will take place by deciding where the power is going to go.

Brown says KPH will petition the Davis government for a series of transformer substations along the route to make the Bruce Complex power available in the area where it is generated.

Brown says that regional development along the Hydro lines must be locally controlled or the area will not progress.

In addition he states that construction workers now building sections of the Bruce Complex are earning high wages, but that at the completion of construction wages in the region will drop dramatically with the lack of construction jobs.

KPH is also worried about the environmental impact of the Hydro lines and has issued a call for students to help in the organizing against the power line.

In particular Brown says would like participation from Pollution Probe students who could advise on ecological effects, engineering students to explode the "base load myth," and students who could "give us the benefit of their urban experience in campaigning for a cause."

VF will give it to you anytime.

United Way: A corporate rip-off?

University of Toronto president John Evans has once again come out in support of the United Way campaign. And it is not surprising that he is pro-United Way; his stance is consistent with anyone in the position he holds.

In a statement last week in the U of T Bulletin (the administration-owned publicity paper), Evans said: "For many reasons we must continue to rely on a voluntary system of support for welfare work over and above the basic minimum provided by government grants."

But as Evans is wont to do, he never went on to explain what the "many reasons" are. Dr. John also added: "There is no way in which government operated welfare services can replace the work of many of the agencies supported by the United Way."

So, on the one hand the government is only providing a "bare minimum," but on the other hand "government operated welfare services" could "in no way" replace the work of "voluntary agencies." We wonder who wrote Evans' press release.

Evans is either incredibly naive or else so secure and arrogant in power that he feels he can afford to toss about such ridiculous notions and have them actually believed. His statements have been contradicted, for example, by a well-researched group of young social welfare workers known as Citizens Concerned About Social Policy (CCASP).

Rather than paternalistically "helping the poor", as Evans appears to see the UW function, the CCASP has documented corporate interlocks in the UW's board of directors as well as misleading promotional material.

And it's also important to realize that a very small percentage of the money actually collected goes to those who are in need of it.

The CCASP has revealed that 65 per cent of the dollars collected go to pay professional salaries so they can "serve" the poor, while the remainder goes for a variety of unnamed "overhead costs."

The men and women serving at the upper levels of the United Way hierarchy come from the same class roots as our president, so he is naturally going to feel predisposed to their points of view. But the fact remains that as a CCASP brochure says: "The United Way is an antiquated and inefficient method of raising money to solve social and economic problems."

The various corporate executives serving the United Way's board of directors and loaned by their companies to help in the campaigns not only do little to alleviate social inequality and suffering, but also re-enforce the basic premises of the liberal-democratic system.

But these businessmen aren't merely helping the United Way out of the goodness of their hearts, and - surprise, surprise - the UW is not really all that charitable. Most of the services provided by the corporate executives and their companies are tax deductible, and corporations already have a wealth of tax loopholes, not to forget the recent legislation passed to decrease corporate taxes to 40 from 49 per cent.

The various agencies funded by the United Way only treat the symptoms of social ills; by not attempting to solve the underlying causes of these ills they are helping to perpetuate them. But such a move would in part be an attack on themselves, for it is the "good corporate citizens" which also create the underlying social problems.

Those who do the fund raising also do the least amount of contributing. For example, of the $13.2 million raised in Toronto in 1972, only $4.59 million came from corporations, some of whom pay no taxes on their incomes. These same corporations use fund raising to enhance their corporate image at the expense of their employees - who make a disproportionately large contribution for their taxable income.

Even the costs of the sweepstakes campaign presently being run by the United Way to "bring in the bucks" will be financed by the consumer. All the prizes have to be paid for by someone and they'll be taken from costs passed on to you, the consumer.

Yet not everyone can be snowed by the line Evans and his corporate friends are pushing. The United Way's refusal to openly debate the organization with representatives from the CCASP led the Toronto Board of Education to refuse to give the appeal a blanket endorsement. In fact the board has responded by allowing anti-United Way to be distributed in Toronto schools, and that project is being funded by a grant from U of T's SAC.

While to most citizens the alternate to this farcical voluntary organization, the government, is just as distrustful, it does still present a real alternative. Another alternative would be to give to Toronto-based organizations which serve as more constructive alternatives, such as local day care centres.

The main point in whether or not a person contributes to the United Way is whether to support another corporate rip-off which solves no problems, or seek a group which might.

War in the East: Back in the tanks

By CHRIS ROGERS

The latest outbreak of war in the Middle East is the fourth of a long series of what is to come, unless there is a fundamental change of thinking on the part of the world superpowers and both sides of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

The war that started just a few days ago has proven drastically different from the six-day wonder which astonished the world in 1967. The Israelis have not succeeded in defeating the Arab forces in short order, and despite Israel's claim to the contrary they do not have air superiority. In addition, the fact that a number of retired generals have been called to rejoin the Israeli High Command, indicates that a different war is unfolding on the ground and in the air.

emptive strike into Arab territory which Israel has continued to occupy since 1967 in defiance of numerous United Nations' resolutions.

Egypt and Syria launched pre-emptive strikes to ensure that they held the element of surprise. There is ample evidence that Israel was about to strike, at least within a few weeks. Israel is facing elections, and the hard-line and right-wing hawks are gaining ground. If the Israeli government dealt the regrouping Arab forces a mighty blow, this would certainly enhance the present government's position. As it is so far, the war has taken such a turn that the hawks are bound to pick up many more seats.

Another reason for Israel's possible wish to strike is that the Arab armies secure a better bargaining position, they would have to cross the cease-fire line in force and either fight to the pre-1967 frontiers, or at least keep large bridgeheads in Israel-occupied territory until a new ceasefire along new lines were implemented.

When reviewing the fighting as it has progressed this far, it would seem premature to tell whether the Arab states have succeeded or not in their objectives. Israel was not caught unprepared as she first let on; indeed it is likely that they themselves would have attacked. Instead, the Israeli High Command was caught enjoying an ego-trip of Israeli superiority and was suffering from its usual contempt for the Arab forces - an attitude that one can possibly justify on precedence.

time is whether Jordan will join other Arab countries on the battle field. She of all of the Arab nations suffered and lost the most (proportionally) in 1967. King Hussein does not wish to lose his army and does not want to pay the terrible cost to the economy that would result if Jordan entered the war. Yet if the Arab forces in Sinai are successful, he doesn't want to be ignored in any renegotiation of the ceasefire to Arab advantage. Also, if it should prove to be a long war, Arab pressure from outside or from the large Palestinian population might well force her to open up the Arab countries' longest front with Israel. Jordan's role is most important. It is possible that she is acting in accordance to some Arab plan, and that her role for the moment is to sit tight. Jordan's army, although the second best in the Middle East, is small. If Jordan were just sitting out the war, through lack of desire to involve herself, we would have heard cries of treason and accusation of collusion with the enemy from Syria and Iraq. Four weeks ago, there was a general peacemaking between Jordan and Egypt and Syria which undertook the "re-activation" of the "Eastern Front" (Syria and Jordan) with Israel. If Jordan in the near future joins into the fighting, a logical move would be to slice through the Jawlan to the sea of Gallilee and isolate Israel's southern flank on the Jawlan. This would make the situation critical for the Israeli position in Sinai because she would be forced to bring troops up from Sinai.

What shall happen over the next few days or weeks is anyone's guess, but it is clear that the Egyptians seem to be holding their own in the canal area, pushing ahead slowly day by day, while on the other hand the Syrians will probably be driven out of the heights, if they have not been already. The big "if" is: What if the Israelis, having pushed deeply into Syria, are able to drive back the Egyptians? and will they cross the 1967 cease-fire lines on their northern and southern fronts? If so, there could be an Arab oil blockade of the West, which in turn could spell American intervention for she has only 60-65 days of oil on reserves. Despite the fact that this would have unimaginable repercussions, from the Israeli logistical and tactical point of view it is imperative that if their forces are strong enough, they must cross the canal into Egypt and also enter Syria proper and destroy the Arab armies. From the Arabs' point of view, it is imperative that they prolong the war for as long as possible and despite the great cost, for if Israeli forces are held stationary, Jordan could enter the war, pin down many troops, and thus the Arab states could - if the war is long enough - gain a new ceasefire map more to her advantage.

New war the longest yet

Whatever happens, it has proven to be a longer war than that of 1967 or even the short campaign of 1956. The cost has already been tremendous to all sides yet the Arab states are proving themselves willing to spend it to redress the injustices of the 1967 Diktat.

Until peace has been made that takes into account the rights of the Palestinians who have been ignored for 25 odd years by Israel; until all of the territory that the Israelis took in 1967 is restored to its rightful owners; and until the Israelis de-Zionise their western culture implanted in Arab Palestine and give Arabs in Israel an equal sense of participation on an equal footing with Israelis of Jewish faith; there will be a repeated series of wars. If such is not to be the case, it is up to the world to impose a just settlement and reinforce it by sanctions.

Chris Rogers has been a student of Middle Eastern affairs for four years at the U of T Islamic Studies department. He has visited both Israel and the Arab countries, having spent part of 1966 in Israel and Jordan, 1967 in Israel (with visits to the Occupied Territories). He spent 1970 on a kibbutz in the Jezreel Valley, and the next year, he went on an American archeological expedition near the Negev. For the last two summers, he has been a member of a British archeological team in Jordan.

But there are a lot of questions that must be asked: Why did this crisis blow up suddenly - or did it? What were its causes? The greatest question mark is why did Egypt and Syria decide to cross the ceasefire lines into their land which is under Israeli occupation, instead of waiting for the Israeli army or air force to launch the aggression as had been the case in 1956 and 1967?

Arabs consistently humiliated

In the long term, the Arab countries have been consistently humiliated by Israeli forces which would seem to be superior after Arab defeats in the last three rounds of fighting (1948, 1956, 1967).

This, and the tragic plight of the dispossessed and homeless Palestinian refugees of the 1948 and 1967 conflicts was bound to goad an already humiliated people to more desperate lengths. They are determined at all costs to erase the source of humiliation, and despite the 1967 defeat, Arab morale has been boosted to that end.

Once they had regained morale, they were able to quietly - despite Libyan president Muammar al Qadafi, who is an outspoken extremist - prepare their Arab armies for the necessary pre-have almost fully recovered from the effects of the 1967 defeats... and seem to have recovered far better than the Israelis had expected.

Most likely the Arab states chose to move to the military as opposed to the diplomatic sphere, following an American veto this summer, in the UN Security Council, of a resolution with almost unanimous support and with a few abstentions condemning Israel for her continued occupation of Arab territory gained in 1967. Peaceful efforts in this debating club had failed to bring about further construction of settlements of a permanent nature.

Israeli plans cause alarm

The Arab countries were threatened further with permanent loss of their territories after construction there of permanent settlements by Israel. The publication by the Israelis of plans for building large towns in the Sinai, West Bank and Jawlan Heights, and Moshe Dayan's suggestions for the annexation of more parts of occupied territory further alarmed the Arab countries.

Egypt and Syria, along with their Jordanian colleagues, undoubtedly felt that if ever they wanted to regain the enemy-occupied regions, or if they wanted to

Israel underestimated Arab strength

By Sunday, Israel had sent down whatever tanks and other armoured weaponry she felt were needed to drive out the Egyptians, but concentrated the brunt of her attack in the Jawlan region where the Syrians, according to some Israeli sources, had penetrated 20 miles deep.

It was at this point that Israel underestimated Arab strength, for as early as Saturday she had been claiming "total air superiority" which has not yet been proven. The Egyptians were able, under the air cover provided by their missiles, to build up the bridgehead and re-inforce it by constructing more light pontoon bridges across the canal. By moving armoured vehicles and, some have speculated, missile launchers across the waterway, they had built up a front of considerable strength.

On Monday, Israel withdrew from the Bar Lev line of defence along the canal and seemed to be inching back slowly. On the Jawlan, the Israeli forces seem to have been successful in clearing the heights, but some late reports indicate that they are being bogged down on the cease-fire line.

An important consideration at this

Let's get facts on United Way

I have again read another anti-United Way advertisement. For some unknown reason the Varsity has taken it upon itself to condemn this appeal. Why? This attitude has never been explained.

Is there some internal corruption in this organization? If so, it is the duty of the editor to make sure the facts are given accurately. If not, then this "smear campaign" can only serve to hurt people who really need help. I'm tired of reading in The Varsity of the "dirty politics" which probably do not exist.

So let's get the facts, otherwise you have lost another reader.

Reader says SAC gift "deplorable"

I am saddened by SAC's decision to grant money to the 'Citizens Concerned About Social Policy'. The CCASP's desire to abrogate social responsibility through the United Way may now be imputed to the university community en masse. My pride in membership at this community has transformed to shame. Ostensibly a place of education, university has become a battleground where one must buttress one's values against onslaughts of political and social bosh.

Witness to last year's frenetic outrage at fee increases, I am bemused at SAC's support of the CCASP. Their belief in 'people who face the problems are those who should solve them' heartily endorses the transferring of educational costs to the student.

I am not confident that mediocrity in student government at U of T has reached its zenith. Deplorable is SAC's squandering of student money; pitiful is its attempt at hegemony.

Consul: Guinea state "fictitious"

According to a telegram from Agence France Press datelined Dakar 26, the first people's National Assembly of Guinea Bissau has proclaimed the Republic of Guinea Bissau on the 24th, at 8:55 GMT. The announcement of independence constitutes once again an act of propaganda similar to so many others by means of which the PAIGC tries to hide its lack of success. It is a fictitious independence deprived from any legal or moral foundations and it does not correspond to the conditions prevailing in that province.

In fact, the PAIGC, as it has so often been reiterated by the Portuguese government and confirmed by the testimony of numerous visitors, including representatives of the world press, does not control any part of the territory of the province. The Portuguese administration is effectively exercised over the entirety of the territory of the Province which recently was extensively visited by the Minister for Overseas.

The PAIGC has no physical possibility of setting up within the boundaries of that province, either a capital or any government bodies as it is demonstrated by the fact that the so-called proclamation of independence was issued in the capital of a foreign country, by an organization constituted by elements alien to the province.

Varsity director rated 'mugwump'

I see that that dyspeptic mugwump of Varsities past, Tony Usher, is cross with me for my disrespectful comments about historian Edwin C. Guillet. (Letters, October 5.)

I'd like to suggest to our huffy friend that he might be well advised to think occasionally before he delivers himself of his caustic scoldings.

The question to which I addressed myself was not whether Guillet has contributed to our knowledge, but whether or not he is boring. The dogma that authors who write about "ordinary men and women" are to be sanctified, whether or not their works are for "the people" or against them, and regardless of whether their books are stimulating or are pedantic swamps, is not one that I share with Mr. Usher.

I rather think that only someone accustomed to getting scholastic thrills by reading footnotes in the graduate Geography department could be turned on by Guillet's turgid mutterings.

As for Harold Innis, I've always thought that he was more up Mr. Usher's alley.

"Morgentaler must obey law"

Re. Demonstration Supports Doctor, September 24-73. Two observations re your article and accompanying picture.

1. Although it is not stated, the caption below the photo implies that it is a picture of Doctor Morgentaler. We know that it is not so! Perhaps Dr. Tolentino?

2. Eleanor Pelrine is experiencing wishful thinking if she thinks that all pro lifers can be put under the heading a) Roman Catholic, or b) influenced by the Roman Catholic Church. That statement reminds me of the problem in Ireland where the cry is, "Blame it on religion".

Dr. Morgentaler is breaking a Canadian law. He must be forced to obey the laws of this country if he wishes to stay here. The laws are not made to suit the whims of the minority.

Re. Abortion. Why should our laws be changed to give one person (the mother) the legal right to kill another person (the baby) in order to solve the first person's social problem? Have we ever done this in a civilized society?

Capitalism takes another hit

That "capitalism rests on the pursuit of selfish interests", as Ken Sanberg says (Oct. 3), is a statement which has many more denouements than he mentions ... or dares to mention. One great recurring theme in capitalism is the ability of its followers to puff themselves up with a strength which enables them to over-ride their self-known disillusionment with the conviction that their capitalism is somehow morally justified.

Perhaps even in this conditioned age, man is still a large part animal, in that his instinct gives priority to personal physiological needs (selfish?). Perhaps, too, man needs to intellectualize this basic instinct as for instance in competitive games. But when instinct evolved through competition to the utter degeneration of masses for the sakes of a select few, then this act becomes a violation of man's gregarious nature (and man is instinctually gregarious as well as selfish).

Sanberg goes on to say that "where free enterprise has flourished, standards of living have risen for all classes"; although this might be true for the capitalist country in question, it is an unjust accomplishment when man's well-being is considered on a worldly whole. While the capitalist country raises its standards, it is able to do this only at the expense of lesser "developed" countries whose standards are, relatively speaking, being lowered. To realize this, one has only to compare that terrible country to the south of us with one of its victims of foreign investment: the standard of living in the US as compared to India, between 1935 and 1962, increased from 17 times greater to 35 times greater. And when all the underdeveloped countries in which the US has interests are lumped together, the estimated medium- and long-term foreign public indebtedness of these countries rose from $9.7 billion in 1956 to $41.5 billion in 1967.

It is easy to see what greatly contributes to the millions of people who are on the brink of starvation, and if Sanberg ever gets to know the experience of hunger diminishing one's thinking from indignation to apathy, then he might, after once more filling his guts, extend his humanitarianism from his immediate nation to the world as a whole.

Dance blahs vie with sparkles

It really hurts to knock a group of performers like the Toronto Dance Theatre, now in their third program of the season at the Edward Johnson Building's MacMillan Theatre. Individually (and collectively to a certain extent) the members of the Theatre are excellent dancers. What is lacking is a sense of purpose in the programming of the show. Consisting of four relatively short pieces, all in the modern American idiom, the evening dragged. Pinning down the exact reason for this is another matter, though.

The first and third numbers were what can only be called failures. Opening the evening was a piece called "Lacemakers", in which five dancers roamed about the near-empty stage in strangely mechanistic motion, which taken on its own was quite effective. The music was another matter, unfortunately showing that electronic composition can be every bit as dull and lifeless as conventional forms. The second work was more effective, and if it hadn't been surrounded by the two less enjoyable numbers, it might have made the evening the success it deserved to be.

Harold Morgan's "Delicate

Balance," the second work, was something like a danced Walter Mitty. Harold Morgan is waiting for the Go-Train, and sees a poster that says "Fly to Japan". A geisha emerges from behind the sign, which lifts up out of the stage; she dances over, helps him out of his three-piece business suit and into a pair of lounging pajamas. Behind this, a translucent scrim is pulled up to reveal a white disc about six feet in diameter atop a flight of stairs. After a short, erotically-tinged movie is shown on it, it turns around to reveal Patricia Beatty as Harold's fantasy woman.

Beatty, one of the founders of the Dance Theatre, gave a splendid performance as the fantasy woman, gowned in flowing white. Eventually, she and Harold settle down in the enormous white hammock which stretches across the stage from the flight of stairs, only to be interrupted by another movie on the white disc: Harold's wife and children are coming up to the station in the family car. He hops out of the hammock, the fantasy lady retreats, the geisha helps him dress, and he walks out of the station, leaving only the memory of the encounter and his pants behind him.

Nothing short of delightful. This buoyant mood was spoiled, though, by a static and boring piece called "a walk in time", which followed. Four identically dressed dancers moved slowly about the stage, accompanied by persistently dull electronic music.

The fourth part of the program was called "Boat River, Moon," a piece which has been performed before by the company. Moody and ritualistic, it shows a warrior, priest, woman and boatman in an oriental boat. In short scenes, the warrior and the priest do battle, with the girl intervening. In the end, they all lie prone on the stage, either dead or exhausted. The circle closes as they return to the boat and sail away from us.

Like Harold Morgan's "Delicate Balance", this piece was well danced and very effective. If anything was wrong with the evening, it was the disastrous arrangement of the program. Had the second and fourth items been combined with two others which could provide a change of pace from the slow tempo of the music, the Toronto Dance Theatre might have had a success on its hands. As it stands now, it's a mixed bag.

Evamaril Johnson, Peter Jobin, and Bonnie Britton fight for brain-space in the electric media assault of AC/DC

An electric mind prison and there's no escape

Ding-ding, hummmmm, ping, buzz — amusement arcade burps and bleeps take over the playground of the mind. High energy release creates a peak to peak amplitude between people. They talk then flow off into a different time sense. Electronic waves carry their message into the brain — media control — there is no escape. The voltage increases — IMPRINT — IMPRINT — Maurice's head blasts off. The others finish playing with the instant photo mechanism, browse over to the pinball machine and connect on normal language patterns. They speak but no not really. The messages only infiltrate from technological sources. The media is master. The scene shifts. Multi TV screens surround the group and spin-off their images. It's a mosaic world filled with penetrating high frequency noise. TV firing cells explode into heads altering neuro-rhythms and clearing brain tracks. An insidious sub-vocal speech pattern emerges. The flow charge becomes sexual — cybo sex — it spreads its load over onto other people. The system is paralyzed.

Release comes from frenzied super-sonic masturbation releasing its electronic charge in a great cosmic come. But bodies fade beneath the sensory assault — direct brain-to-brain contact is suggested. A drill driven directly into the grey mass of the mind relieves catatonic brain buzz. Media sludge oozes out. Movie stars, TV stars, the media power figures keep the same resonance field going so that they can jack-off into heads. But there's no need to feed off anyone else's electricity. Create your own flowcharge, alternate currents. The vibrations fade out in an electromagnetic theatre field.

It's AC/DC at the New Theatre, Bathurst United Church. You get your own feed-back.

Politics missing: French 'Tempest' lags

Aime Césaire's Une Tempête, currently at Le Théâtre du P'tit Bonheur, 95 Danforth, until Oct. 27, once again glaringly points out the necessary connection between theatre and life, art and reality.

Césaire's 1967 adaptation of Shakespeare's Tempest into an anti-European-colonialist play is out of date with the contemporary African political scene. Director John Van Burek has failed to substitute an equivalent political and economic context that would provide the focus and meaning for Césaire's original work.

Instead of creating a specific political situation that would force his audience to take moral positions and accept responsibility for the white man's actions in Africa, Van Burek's setting in which white colonial administrator Prospero is confronted by the revolt of his black slaves Caliban and Ariel has a general metaphysical, allegorical quality. Cries for liberty and Freedom Now! become platitudes glibly applauded by an unmoved audience.

Van Burek provides no reminder of the French cultural and political genocide in Madagascar, Algeria, Indochina or of mass slaughter and economic exploitation in Morocco or the Belgian Congo which Césaire vehemently protests. There is no indication in this production or in the program notes that this black Martinique poet and politician has made the study of European colonialism his life works. As early as the 30's and 40's, Césaire was exploring its effects on African culture and politics in marxist-surrealist literary journals, and in 1955 he wrote his Discourse on Colonialism. We are left, instead, with the mere outer shell of a work deprived of its inner meaning.

Ignoring the original political implications of Une Tempête, Van Burek overemphasizes the theatricality of the work particularly in the opening storm scene in which the ship-wrecked sailors jump around on stage on pogo sticks and dangle from rope ladders amidst flashes of lightning and the clashing of empty oil drums. In the midst of Shakespearian verse and Peter Brook theatricality, only forceful acting of the beautiful black Haitian actor Serge Dorleans as the revolting "savage" Caliban provides a dramatic focal point.

If Van Burek had painted his silver oil drums with Gulf Oil signs to indicate that the western economic exploitation of Africa continues, if he had drawn attention to contemporary atrocities in Mozambique, Angola, South and Southwest Africa, or if he had produced Une Tempête with an all black cast to emphasize the essential satiric nature of this play, this production of Césaire's work could have been received with the acclaim it deserves.

Truck Theatre's "I Do! I Do!" doesn't.

The Toronto Truck Theatre provided a four poster centre-stage bed for actors Wayne Wilson and Donna Quenan to act on in their Colonnade Theatre production of I Do! I Do!. They should have been as considerate of their audience.

The four poster (which by the way is the name of the Jan de Hartog's play from which Tom Jones and Harvey Schmidt adapted I Do! I Do! musically for Broadway) is the central image of the show. The bed remains as constant witness to the evolving marital relationship between Michael and Agnes, from naive, but energetic and impetuous partners, to battle-scarred, but calm and stolid old hands at the game we call marriage. Michael grows from a fledgling writer of promise into a full fledged male chauvinist author of romantic narrative, while Agnes tends home, children and a growing awareness of herself as a woman, until the older and wiser Michael and Agnes, having managed to survive the pitfalls of a lifetime together, move into an apartment, leaving behind them their too-big "now that the kids are married" house, and, of course, their four poster.

The bed is a particularly apropos metaphor of both play and production. For the play, it symbolizes the spiritual, emotional, and, of course, physical union demanded of those who make a "till death do us part" pledge. In the production, however, it served only to constantly remind me where I might have been. The only thing that did keep me awake was Dave Tinning's rather erratic lighting design which fluctuated with all the subtlety of a flash-bulb. On the other hand, Thomas Guzman's direction was subtle. So subtle, in fact, that it is difficult to tell whether this show was directed at all.

Guzman has taken an intimate show put it in an intimate theatre and in the process successfully obliterated any feeling of intimacy between his two actors and their audience. Unless, of course, we consider often barely audible dialogue and lyrics as intimate. There seemed to be no feeling whatsoever that these two people were even close to one another, let alone married. Physical, spiritual and emotional contact was so restricted that for a play set entirely in a bedroom, it can only be considered obscene. Indeed, it seems ironic that the use of the major metaphor of the show — the bed — is one of the major reasons the show didn't work.

The bed seemed to be constantly in the actors' way. Instead of using it for all it's worth, or discarding it completely, Guzman required his actors to ignore it as much as possible, which seems odd since it was the only well-lit area on the stage. Guzman has opted instead for awkward round-the-bed manoeuvres through half-light and shadow, which only served to obscure both actors and any sense of life. Too bad the bed couldn't act.

However, not to worry, Wayne Wilson couldn't either. To be fair, I Do! I Do! is a difficult show from the actor's standpoint, since it must be carried by only two people. The Broadway musical was originally carried off by the virtuoso performances of Robert Preston and Mary Martin. Unfortunately, Wilson can barely carry a tune, let alone a virtuoso performance. He carries the emotional range and subtle comic nuances of a baseball bat. The supposed continual mental and physical progression from a lively young man to old gentleman was apparent only in the last two minutes of the second act, when he suddenly hunched over and walked with faltering steps — an illusion of age he immediately destroyed by carrying out a trunk full of clothes with all the effort of Superman lifting a match-box.

The same youth to age progression was handled admirably by Donna Quenan who transformed herself subtly but persistently. Quenan's singing voice is quite acceptable, and it was delightful to discover that she acts quite well. Her obvious determined effort to develop a realistic rapport and convincing communication with her husband are no less laudable for being obvious. It certainly wasn't her fault she had to play to a baseball bat.

Toronto Dance Theatre at the Edward Johnson Building

Grand opera parody flops

The Toronto Dance Theatre's second program closed last week, but their third program is still on at the Edward Johnson Building, until tomorrow.

Program 2 featuring the Toronto Repertoire orchestra was five works long. The first, described by choreographer Peter Randazzo as a "human in a surrealistic land-scape" was entitled "A Flight of Spiral Stairs", with music by Milton Barnes. The decor was a bare spiral staircase a small white cloud and an empty picture frame. The music was thin and jagged; the movements of the dancers jerky and tense. This piece had an alienating and disturbing quality, with the dancers only making the occasional acknowledgement of each other's presence.

"Operetta", the next work on the program aped the "grand opera" style and classical ballet. Opera "singers" sang with mouths held in an open position. The dancers' bodies were card-like, and only their hands and the tilt of their heads permitted expression. It was neither ballet nor opera — just a failure. The "ballet" sequences proved more humorous with a particularly noteworthy performance by Barry Smith. Even though Smith and his partner caught the audience's sense of humour with some un-balletic poses, I began to wonder just who was laughing at whom.

"I had Two Brothers", the next piece, had a simple and elemental decor. It portrayed the classical dilemma of the jealousy of two brothers and the ensuing murder of one. Peter Randazzo and David Earle sensitively showed a camaraderie, joy for life and fondness for one another, only to let it develop into mutual suspicion and murder.

The fourth item, also choreographed by Peter Randazzo, was called "Visions for a Theatre of the Mind", a theme- and - variations on music provided by bongos and claves. Almost portraying ideas, the identically-dressed dancers ignored sexual roles, with the male dancer at the side of his two female colleagues, rather than in the middle, as traditional ballet dictates.

The finale, "Baroque suite", featured the music of Bach and Vivaldi, played by the Toronto Repertoire Orchestra. The rhythms and form of the music were the jumping-off point for these pieces, which ended a varied, and (at times) exciting evening.

make it with Gilbey's
the tall 'n frosty one

A tremendously brilliant book has appeared from the pen of a member of the journalism department at Western. Subliminal Seduction, by Prof. Wilson Bryan Key, PH.D., incisively exposes the conscious plot by the advertising industry to exploit the sexual subconscious of the buying public.

Using examples from some of America's largest magazines: Time, Playboy, Cosmopolitan, Vogue, etc., Prof. Key perceptively dissects ads to reveal the subliminal techniques being utilized.

Thus, he points out, for example, that an advertisement showing a little girl about to plant a "sloppy kiss" on her doll really represents, in symbolic terms, a forbidden but secretly (ie. subconsciously) desired act of sex to millions of mothers and their daughters.

The shadows on a Gilbey's gin ad (you've probably seen it in Time or Maclean's) similarly, can be interpreted as a partially erect penis and vaginal lips, respectively, surrounded by discharged sperm, according to Prof. Key. A drop of water in the ad, he says, is obviously a clitoris. And subconsciously, viewers react to the symbolism: on viewing the Gilbey's ad, for example, "several young women" reported that they were "horny".

The use of one particularly vulgar symbol is especially frequent: "a face surrounded by hair - vaginal symbol". "Red lips", too, are "vaginal symbols", according to Prof. Key. The reader will immediately realize that he has been subjected to these two representations many times every day - incontrovertible proof of the pervasiveness of advertising techniques.

Another example: cigarettes:

obvious phallic symbols designed to appeal to the sex drive. And the word 'tastes' (used in many food and drink ads), Prof. Key points out, is profoundly sexual - the 'a' has merely to be changed to an 'e' to produce the word 'testes'. The subconscious mind, he says, immediately picks this up.

In a Sprite ad, the configurations in the ice cube immediately revealed to Prof. Key's trained mind that which is invisible to the ordinary viewer: a "polar bear...in sexual embrace with a nude woman."

The examples could be multiplied indefinitely (and Prof. Key does so in the book). But the point should be clear, and we are indebted to Prof. Key for making it.

Of course, other interpretations are possible. A cynical reader, for example, might draw the conclusion that Prof. Key's awareness that "during the past decade dozens of books dealing primarily with cognitive or conscious human experience have reached the best-seller list" might indicate a desire on his part to cash in on an obvious market.

Others might charge that he trivializes and grossly oversimplifies an aspect of the advertising world, that his conclusions are so over-generalized as to be largely useless. Such people might claim that the nature of sexual drives and how they are exploited and twisted in a repressive society is a subject deserving of more serious consideration.

It is also possible that a hairsplitting pedant could question the validity of Prof. Key's findings, such as the one that some young women reportedly were "horny". Was it the ad that brought this on, or were they simply horny, period? Similarly, it is true that he offers no evidence whatever that admen deliberately use these techniques. But this is nipping.

Some might also claim that his interpretations of symbols in the most blatantly sexual way possible are a crude form of Freudianism laughed out of most of the intellectual community years ago. There are even those who point to Freud's remark, who, when once accused of perpetually smoking phallic cigars, said that "sometimes a cigar is just a cigar." Such people would also be likely to maintain that he destroys the legitimate point that many ads are erotic by trying to draw out ridiculous specific symbolisms.

Others might be so mechanistic and naive as to object that referring to everything that is longer than it is wide as a phallic symbol is of questionable validity, since virtually every object in existence, other than perfect cubes, is longer in one dimension than another. (and even cubes throw non-cubic shadows.)

It is even possible, one supposes, that an untrained and immature reader might conclude that Prof. Key has a dirty mind. There's even a story going around, spread, no doubt, by anti-intellectual philistines of this kind, of a mayor from a certain French town, who, on visiting New York, was taken to see the Empire State Building, which, he told his astounded hosts, reminded him of a naked woman. When asked how it resembled one, he is said to have replied, "Ah, messieurs, everything reminds me of a naked woman."

The intellectual bankruptcy of critics of Prof. Key who try to debunk his theories in this should be self-evident. What they are displaying, is, no doubt, jealousy of a man who can view, for example, an ad featuring a woman with her hand in her pocket, and immediately conclude, by applying his psychological training, that she is "touching her genitals - probably her clitoral area." A mind that works this way is undeniably inspired, not dirty.

In fact, Prof. Key notes the nature of the criticism of his theories himself. His approach, he notes, "can make calm, gentle, considerate individuals, outraged, and aggressive." A result, no doubt, of their own sexual insecurities.

Rather than reacting negatively, it is important to absorb Prof. Key's mode of analysis and apply it more widely. For not even he seems to have perceived the full extent to which these reprehensible methods are being applied.

Two or three examples that have come to the attention of this reviewer should suffice:

One: it is shocking that capitalism, which has always used religion as a way to suppress discontent with social conditions by promising 'pie in the sky' has found another, even more dangerous way, to exploit the forces of religion. The evidence: observations by a number of independent individuals have conclusively revealed that God Almighty Himself has been added to the payroll of the Madison Avenue sharpshooters.

Should the reader be inclined to become "defensive, outraged, and aggressive" when confron-

The full name of the author, the should be noticed, is merely "low sin" transposed - a subliminal way to catch the reader's eye by arousing forbidden but commercially potent thoughts, most likely of adulterous anilingus. "Bryan", of course, has the same number of letters as both "penis" and "vulva", and therefore connotes an act of intercourse. This is powerfully reinforced by the surname "Key" - a key, of course enters a key-hole. The name, then, is designed to make the reader buy the book by working on his subconscious. And then - note that "Key" is at the same time simply "yek" spelled backconsciously effective attempt by the book industry to debunk the contents of the book while still reaping the profits of its sale.

The industry clearly does not want the book to be believed,
even though it is selling it.

Further: on the back flap of the book, there is a picture of Prof.
Key himself. He is frowning slightly, while gesturing with his glasses; his head is completely shaved. Those familiar with Prof.
Key's theories will have no dif-

represents aggressive - repressive sexuality, while his shaved head unmistakably symbolizes an erect, circumcised penis, with a milky, out-of-focus curtain in the background being obviously symbolic of recently ejaculated semen.

This unintended (one supposes) example is a clincher. It should be clear proof for even the most sceptical of the validity of Prof. Key's theories. One only

Bonnie Raitt pulls some mean strings

I always feel cheated when when I find out that a great musician I've just heard for the first time has been around for a while.
That's the way I felt when I heard Bonnie Raitt on record, and her live performance reinforced that sensation.

Bonnie Raitt plays gloriously spirited slide guitar, sings the blues with rare insight and expression and even composes a few songs. It's unfortunate that all this talent really hasn't been unleashed to the public in any great quantity.

Raitt was exposed to the entertainment industry at an early age, being the daughter of Broadway singer John Raitt. Her Quaker parents tried to get her away from the negative big-city influences of Los Angeles by sending her first to a politically oriented summer camp in the early sixties, and later to an activist Quaker high school. Both experiences helped cultivate Bonnie's love for music and her political consciousness.

It was at college in Cambridge,
Mass., that Bonnie met blues agent Dick Waterman, and through him came to be friends with many of the performers she admired Son House, Buddy Guy, Fred McDowell (a legendary delta bottleneck guitar player, who died last summer), Junior Wells and Robert Pete Williams. She began playing in public in 1969 and quickly worked her way up to playing the Philadelphia Folk Festival and the Gaslight in New York. The recording contract came soon after, even with her provision for artistic control ("they just give me the money and I give them the tapes").

To date Bonnie has recorded three albums on Warner Bros., Bonnie Raitt, Give It Up, (released a year ago) and the newest Taking My Time, which is due to be released this month.

The first LP, Bonnie Raitt, has a most interesting background that illustrates Bonnie's feelings about the business side of the music industry.

"My first record was done in a garage. I had heard that Dave Ray (of the blues trio Koerner, Ray and Glover who used to record on Elektra) was starting a studio in Minneapolis, trying to do it on four tracks, trying to keep down the whole business of studio costs and middlemen in order to eventually put out records for one or two dollars with a complete accounting of how every penny was spent. And he needed something to get him off the ground...Dave had never recorded anything on this scale, none of us had made a record
before...it was fun.

"We rented a summer camp, did it in a garage - it's a real funky record. My voice was on the same track with another guitar and the bass, the horns were out in the driveway, and the drums leaked on everybody's track...we didn't really care.

"It's more important to me that I did it like that, that I had a really good time and brought some fine musicians together."

The vitality of the final product is truly a function of the degree of spontaneity in the recording process. The fact that people like Junior Wells and A.C. Reed, bothered to go up to the recording session from Chicago to help Bonnie out is really indicative of the respect she commands from her fellow musicians.

The second album is a more polished effort recorded at the Bearsville studios in Woodstock again using friends and musicians who just happened to be around - Paul Butterfield, Amos Garrett, Chris Parker, Katz Lomax and Eric Katz. The songs are more contemporary than those on the earlier LP and there are even a couple of Dixieland Bridges on the bluesier tunes. Raitt has also maintained a pattern of revising vintage early sixties songs, this time with "If You Gotta Make a Fool of Somebody" and Barbara Georges' "I Know" (the unreleased album includes the oldie, "Let Me In"). Most important, though, Raitt tries to sing songs that will give exposure to deserving artists. A favorite, whose songs grace both albums, is Texas blueswoman Sippie Wallace, who writes the blues (a male dominated field), from a woman's point of view. A sly song about female sexuality called "You Got To Know How" is especially effective on that level.

Raitt says she would sing more blues than she does, but feels her voice can't really handle the keys required. The problem is that guitar styles were developed in two tunings and her singing range just doesn't coincide with them. She can't really use a capo to change the tuning (and keep the fingering the same) because bottleneck style makes heavy use of octaves and the guitar neck is just too short. The explains the strong reliance on material from more contemporary composers like Joel Zoss, Jackson Browne and Eric Katz, even though Bonnie's a bitch of a guitar player.

I was fortunate enough to see
Bonnie Raitt perform in Buffalo, last Sunday. Immediately, I was knocked out by her outstanding bottleneck guitar work and her command of the audience. Working with a small band consisting of Dave Maxwell on piano, Dennis Whitted on drums and her long time bassist, Freebo, she rocked and wailed and completely charmed the crowd.

Talking to Raitt later was a further surprise. She was anything but the ego-centred
"star" that most performers become after they get a few albums under their belts. What continually emerged in conversation was her political concern.
She feels a strong commitment to doing benefits for political causes and feels an attachment to the women's movement. But Raitt doesn't think direct political songs, à-la Pete Seeger or Joan Baez are the route for her.
Instead she prefers to sing songs that examine realistic man/woman relationships. She hopes that she can put authentic blues singers on the same bill with her, helping them gain public exposure.

Very refreshing.

Silver's intelligent jazz is a delight to listen to

In Pursuit of the Twenty-Seventh Man
Horace Silver
Blue Note

Horace Silver has come up with an all-out winner — "In pursuit of the Twenty-Seventh Man", on the Blue Note label. Silver's long-standing arrangement of piano, sax, trumpet, drums and bass is the format here, with the addition of David Freidman on vibes on four of the cuts.

The title tune refers to a mystical search for a higher form of humanity, and is typical of Silver's intelligent approach to jazz. It's all fairly straight-ahead stuff, particularly "Liberated Brother", one of the two tunes not penned by Silver himself. Written by Weldon Irvine, it's dedicated to those who are liberated in "mind, body and spirit", and Silver calls it the "icing on the cake" of this album.

The disc features the work of Randy (trumpet) and Mike (tenor)

Brecker, two very talented brothers who make each phrase sound natural and uncluttered. There's really not too much else to say about this album. It's funky, it swings, it's a pure delight to listen to. One hell of a lot of love was put into this record and it really shines through in each cut. Don't do anything else — go get this album NOW. By far the best jazz combo disc in a long, long time.

CANADIAN STUDENTS NOW HAVE NO VOICE AT THE NATIONAL LEVEL

Since 1969 Canadian students have been without a national student union organization.

The federal government provides 50 percent of the operating budget for post-secondary education in Canada. It pays the money directly to the provinces which then pass it on to the universities and colleges.

This financing arrangement is now being re-negotiated between the two levels of government. Some officials are talking about drastically lowering the public cost of education by increasing tuition fees fivefold. Money could be borrowed from a special fund and repaid as a percentage of income after graduation.

All these proposals are being discussed while students have no voice at the federal level to perform research and defend student interests. Meanwhile, students continue to face problems associated with the lack of low-cost housing and meaningful employment opportunities in many fields.

At meetings last November and last May, student council representatives from across Canada formed the National Union of Students to attempt to fill the vacuum. Campuses are required to hold student referenda before they may join. Wherever referenda were held last spring, students voted to join NUS.

NUS fees have been set at 30 cents per student. If U of T students vote to join, the Students' Administrative Council will pay NUS about $4200 this year and about $6700 in following years. The cost can be absorbed within the present SAC budget.

On October 17 and 18 U of T undergraduates will be asked
"DO YOU SUPPORT MEMBERSHIP OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO STUDENTS' ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL IN THE NATIONAL UNION OF STUDENTS?"

Other questions on the ballot ask students if they support

- equal faculty-student representation and dismissal of faculty members on bodies making decisions with regard to the hiring, promotion, salary, granting of tenure,

"American Graffiti" forgets those weren't the days, even then

American Graffiti (the unsatisfactory title of a low-key film by George Lukas) attempts to catch the look and feel of 1962, and the sensibilities of a middle-sized town's high-school kids. How it will strike people who differ from my own age by five years either way I don't know, but for me a big part of the movie was that it jarred a lot of memories. That isn't a very difficult or a very profound thing to do, but the film's ambitions go beyond mere nostalgia-peddling, and despite some noteworthy successes, it falls on a level more substantial than a technical or professional one. That's praise of a sort, but scant comfort for those of us who would have liked a definitive, mature work about those giddy, terminal days of the era we call, somewhat inaccurately, the fifties.

It is Saturday night early in September, in a California town. For most of the kids it's the night of the first big hop, anticipated as eagerly as Ascot Opening Day by the titled nobbs in Britain. For two others, Curt and Steve, it's the last night as big men in the hometown, before flying east to college, a prospect that spurs them on to voluminous second thoughts. The movie is so sharp about all the nonsense of those years that you wince to think that those things mattered once to you — maybe not much, but it hurts to think it mattered at all.

movie is spliced together out of several, sub-plots, each concentrating on a character or two, that cross and recross with increasing frequency as night thins out into a sobering grey dawn of reckoning.

What unifies the plot-threads and gives the film its particular vision is the shared culture of the characters, though culture is certainly a strange word for it. A terrifying need to belong, to have some status and know what it is, is the deepest emotion in these kids. It is expressed in the repulsive argot of the day, with words like grungy, boss, bitchin' which denote varying degrees of affection or scorn. You were defined in terms of what you approved and what you scorned. Adulation was owed to superiors — cheerleaders, class officers, football players, people who had "wheels"; they despised their inferiors who in turn despised the outcasts who were called gorks, or turkeys, or grunges. Even sex, which in the film consists entirely of energetic petting, is less a matter of good old horniness than a display of one's own desirability that might nudge your status up a notch or two.

American Graffiti resorts, for its effects, to a veritable nostalgia-rama of golden oldies. The slang, the dress, the insanities like throwing a moon or being served cherry cokes by gum-chewing broads on roller-skates, are doled out so assiduously that at times you wonder if the movie was directed by a computer programmed by Peter Bogdanovich. But all the reminiscences contribute their bit to filling in a picture of the social structure that is the movie's backbone. Though thick, the nostalgia is not the director's way of showing off his cleverness. In fact, the

Some things are caught masterfully. A cheerleader who desperately wants her boyfriend, Steve, to stay in town rather than to go east to college picks up a stranger in a hot-rod, and, as they cruise the town's strip together, are soon spotted (being spotted is the whole point of the endless car-cruising). Her disgust with herself for stooping to such a ploy is evident, but her craving for Steve's affection — surely not love, even to them — conquers her scruples. Soon the story gets around. Two girlfriends, premature crones who instinctively play out their "busybody" roles, make a beeline to Steve with the news, and he runs off in pursuit. The rituals of high heterosexuality are acted out as punctiliously as Roman auguries or Medieval passion plays, and we betide the player who muffs a line or laughs when the mood is sombre.

The main trouble is, American Graffiti says it was all like that. It wasn't all like that. Even in those days, we had some sense of the artificiality and tawdriness of the little high-school world, a sense that developed and strengthened as adolescence faded. Even though we might, on an emotional level, have felt forlorn at being left out of some weekend doing, or triumphant at some petty achievement like class office, there was a quiet, steady conviction that, really, all that didn't amount to much, that our lives hadn't started yet, and when it did it wouldn't be like this. Without that conviction, which may not have even been a conscious one, a lot of us might not have made it through adolescence in one piece.

The characters in American Graffiti lack this two-sided appraisal of their situations. Much of the story, for instance, revolves around the two college-bound guys and their dilemma — whether to start life anew in a different part of the country, or stay just a little longer in the snug little world where they are somebody. One eventually goes, the other stays behind, trapped by his scheming girlfriend who believes she's doing the best thing for him. There's something wrong here. After all, these two had vision and determination enough to get themselves into a college, and a college three thousand miles away at that. Visions that strong are not lightly discarded, I remember my own friends as our final year closed in on us; none of us could wait to get out of town, or at least out of that school.

This failure to give the characters aspirations, a sense of their own futures, (probably strongest at that juncture between adolescence and adulthood than at any other time in our lives) makes American Graffiti a shallow film. Affectionate, shrewd, compassionate, but shallow. At times, it comes perilously close to soap opera, though soap opera punctuated by constant comic relief. And there's something distressing at the movie's idea of humour. It laughs at very many of the same things we used to laugh at before we knew any better. One boy, called Toad, is the quintessential "turkey" — ungainly, horny, inept, physically repulsive. He is the butt of most of the script's jokes, including one where several onlookers stand transfixed as he vomits up all the bourbon his recently acquired date cajoles him into buying. This is a cheap, contemptible way of getting laughs. I wonder if the writers think they redeemed themselves by an easy stroke of pathos when, in a dumb post-script, we are told that Terry, or Toad, was killed in Vietnam a few years later. All the laughs at Terry's expense, that the writers have painstakingly set up for us, stick in our throats. Are we supposed to be ashamed at ourselves? Or disgusted with the writers for making Terry the butt of one last gruesome joke?

That post-script, like the ones in Z or The French Connection, almost pulls the movie down with it. Inadvertently, it reveals a lot of the scriptwriters' hidden prejudices, which the movie itself avoided. First of all, only four of the characters are thus projected, all of them men, as if women had no right to expect anything but a lifetime of domestic drudgery. The town hot-rodder, who has been prolonging his adolescence well into his twenties (and who is the film's most appealing character, which seems adventitious) is killed by a drunken driver. Well, these things happen) a poignant touch of melodrama that underscores the plot's soapy propensities.

Terry's death in Vietnam, while reprehensible in terms of the movie's crass treatment of him, nonetheless reminds us that the assassinations, the war and the chaos of the sixties is right around the corner. But why are we reminded of that? To see the time portrayed as an irrevocable, fin-de-siècle era? More likely to pave the way for a few last, unnecessary liberal pieties. Curt, who goes off to college on a Magic Carpet Airlines flight, is now "a writer, living in Canada" for which read draft-dodger. Steve, who stayed home, is now an insurance salesman in Modesto, California. It is perfectly clear that somebody thinks Curt quite smart and Steve quite a jerk. We may agree with that or not but in any case what does that have to do with the story? Unless the whole point is that what we do in high school will affect our whole lives, and that going off to college is a magic carpet that will solve all our problems? It sounds just like the drivel our guidance counsellors and principals used to feed us when they were lecturing us on our responsibilities, and I still don't believe a word of it.

Fantastic costumes and an eerie atmosphere were the high points of Dr. John's concert at Massey Hall Sunday night, but as for the music... well...

voodoo, blues

Dr. John gives a great show but where's the music?

Dr. John's Sunday night concert appearance had a few points against it before it began. At 8 pm, the announced starting time, crowds were still shuffling restlessly outside the locked doors of Massey Hall. It was the same old excuse - border-crossing problems, and equipment was late being set up. The show finally began 50 minutes later.

The lights went down and the hall was in complete darkness while the musicians arranged themselves on stage. But they took too long. Cat calls ensued and flash bulbs popped - no way to create the sense of mystery they obviously wanted. When the lights did come up, there was a motley six piece band playing on stage.

Each member of the group was dressed to reflect the band's New Orleans roots. Blacks wore African styles, from bright coloured robes to leopard skins on bare chests, while the garb of the two whites was explorer oriented - the sax player wore a foppish French costume and the trumpet player wore buckskins.

Doctor John soon entered costumed in a huge multi-coloured head-dress of feathers, a patchwork robe and a cluster of beads and talismans. He wandered the stage in a slow aimless strut and soon settled behind the piano. If the proceedings had stopped then, the concert would have ended at its high point.

Dr. John is also known as the "night tripper", and to help reinforce that image, the stage was graced with a voodoo witchdoctor type, outfitted in black sequined tights, a clutch of pink feathers about his chin and long silver streamers hanging from his arms. He was hardly a sinister figure as he lamely danced out of step to the music and shook a tambourine. He spent the rest of the time off to the side of the stage (but in plain view of the audience) drinking a bottle of beer.

There was a sprinkling of songs from the six LP's recorded by Dr. John, like "Walk on Guilted Splinters" and "Iko Iko". But most of the tunes were from the last and most successful record, In The Right Place.

The musicianship rarely varied above a level of moderate competence. Mac Rebennack (the good Doctor's real name) showed no evidence of the genius keyboard talent he's been pronounced as possessing. In fact his playing was often downright sloppy and the singing was mumbled.

And if the musicians seemed uninterested and static, the audience was even more so. The crowd seemed detached from the music, a lot of people walked out well before the uneventful end.

It was a thoroughly boring event. If you missed this one, you came out ahead of most of the 2000 people who were there.

One-liners get big yoks

Three doctors in bloodstained coats are freaked out on acid. So is the patient. The nurse is a sober harridan. A pre-operative conference being attempted.

Doctor No. 1: How can you tell how old he is with a hand saw?

Doctor No. 2: Just count the rings in his leg.

Nurse: Hey, you just cut off his leg!

Doctor No. 2: You just made me lose count.

If Lemmings, touring satirist group from the National Lampoon, had kept all their jokes that short Tuesday night at Massey Hall, they might have been effective. Because the seven very versatile actors have a good thing going. But their act is a tedious too much of a good thing.

They played for over an hour and a half to a packed house that seemed to appreciate their completely irreverent sense of humour and could still find "fuck" funny after its 987th repetition.

The first half of the show was a collection of skits and jokes that attacked everyone — sometimes the audience.

"Who and what was Richard Nixon?" an offstage voice asks. "To find out more about the man behind the liar..."

The POW's return. One legless POW thanks the Nixons for the skateboard. Johnny, the perennial American infantryman, calls himself "the closet queen of battle".

Switch to Watergate hearings. Chevy Chase's imitation of a tongue-tied Sam Ervin, who keeps calling Haldeman, the witness on the stand, by every other famous Watergate name, breaks the audience up. "The tapes will be released in late fall in conjunction with the movie," Haldeman says.

Cut to Bebe Rebozo with heavy Italian accent promoting the sale of the tapes and of other records he's sure we'll like. From backstage come sample songs — the Kennedy Brothers singing "Wake up, Mary Jo" to the tune of the everly Brothers' "Wake up, Little Susie".

Then we hear the president's voice from offstage — and the imitation was so real I actually thought it was Nixon. "If I was to make public these tapes, no one would want to speak to me," he says.

The pacing during this first part of the show was fine and even though I'm still squeamish about scatology and cannibalism (solve the meat crisis — adopt a Vietnamese orphan), I enjoyed the act.

The second half, the much praised Woodshuck Festival of Peace, Love and Death, was too overrated and slow to save me or my delicate sensibilities.

Credit to the master of ceremonies, John Belushi, whose connecting material between the others' imitations of rock performers kept the whole thing together.

Coultet's imitation of Joni Mitchell got a large ovation from the crowd. And her Joan Baez, babe-in-arms, asking the audience to join in while she sang for her husband David was funny. Chorus: "Pull the triggers, niggers, we're with you all the way." Audience didn't join in even after she changed it to "pull the treegroes, Negroes..."

The finale with Megadeth — the audience dies at the end of the performance when the amps are turned up to over 700 decibels, Coultet as groupie, tells us — was just a lot of noise to me.

Then again, that was probably the whole point. Nearly everyone else gave Lemming a standing ovation.

...and jokes

John Mayall's range is limited but "If" is a pleasant surprise

Last Sunday's SAC concert in Convocation Hall featured elder statesman of British blues, John Mayall with his current band and a little-known group called If. The audience was appreciative for If but it saved its greatest warmth for Mayall and didn't seem disappointed, although anyone familiar with Mayall's records would agree that he's capable of much more than was heard at this concert, or at least at the first show.

Mayall's sidemen this time around were Freddy Robinson on lead guitar, Victor Gaskin, bass, the celebrated Keef Hartley on drums, Red Holloway, woodwinds, Blue Mitchell, trumpet, and the master himself on keyboards, vocals, harp and (briefly) guitar. Best of them was Fred Robinson; he can't beat Roy Buchanan but he's a good tasty guitarist and acquitted himself well, although his short stint as lead vocalist was unsuccessful. They opened up with a funky low-down blues in which Mayall's Clavinet (a very distinctive instrument made famous in Billy Preston's "Outa Space") provided the rhythmic backdrop for a series of solid solos on the treble instruments. It wasn't until the second number that Mayall's voice, sounding a little hoarser and more urgent than usual, made its appearance. In fact, the whole concert was largely instrumental, made up as it was, largely of jamming material. Mayall's set in particular was structured this way and suffered a bit from the lack of variety that ensues when your range of musical styles only stretches from fast blues jam to slow blues jam. Even so there was lots of room for interesting music, including some very intense and exciting climaxes.

But if John Mayall et al. were the more refined musicians, it was British hard-rock group If who made the most lively music of the evening. Especially compelling were the woodwind man's rippling double-tongued opening number flute cadenza and some of the powerful leads that were coming from the guitar. A slight muddiness in the bass may have been caused by Convocation Hall's acoustics, which are definitely preferable to Maple Leaf Gardens, but are still far from ideal.

Keyboard man for If, surprisingly, was Gabriel Mekler, late of Steppenwolf and Janis J.'s second band, and he's by no means the only fine musician in the group. They're a good band, and let's hope we hear more from them in the future.

A triumphant Canadian Opera season ends this weekend with tonight's performance of Fidelio, truly as stunning a production as the COC has ever given us. Tomorrow at 2 is the last of The Merry Widow, sure to be sold out. Tomorrow night is your last chance to see the delightful Barber of Seville.

The Edward Johnson Building, the home of the Faculty of Music, is also home to an annual series of concerts called the Thursday Evening Series, which regularly feature artists of international calibre. Other Thursday evening shows are given by the members of the Faculty to raise money for scholarships, and these are one of the best values for music fans in this city. As a student, you can see the Faculty's resident String Quartet, the Orford Quartet in a performance of Beethoven, Bartok and Smetana for only $1.50. Bring your student card.

Another series at the EJB is the long line of recitals given by students of the school. These recitals, free and open to the public are held throughout the year, and you might see tomorrow's TSO soloist in a performance of demanding and enjoyable music. This year's series is already under way, and on Monday night Bonnie Silver, piano, will be heard. The performance is at 8:15 p.m., in the concert hall of the Edward Johnson Building, behind the planetarium.

Also at the EJB this weekend is the third program in the Toronto Dance Theatre's fall season, reviewed in this issue. For those interested in music and the arts, this building provides all sorts of low-cost alternatives to the downtown culture palaces. Don't forget the free record listening room on the third floor - just bring you ATL card and over 100,000 records are at your disposal.

movies

Of all the movies we saw last year only Bergman's Cries and Whispers and Jan Troell's The Emigrants really stand out. Two films couldn't be more different. Bergman's sisters reveal their deepest passions, fears and fantasies while spending a week's death-watch at the family estate. Troell's emigrants bare little, they are closer to the laconic heroes of adventure movies. They are in fact adventurers, but realistic ones, without heroics. These are discreet, contained individuals, known by their deeds (leaving the old country to found their families in America) as our grandparents were. Troell doesn't delve (Bergman delves so brilliantly it raises goosebumps) but he observes and respects. The land through his lens is awesome and close; the people noble in daily ways. The territory the film gives up by not pushing into our souls, it compensates for by convincing us of our own history. (Apparently the film has been better received here than in Europe - it is our history.) All this despite Warner Bros.' butchering on the grounds that North American audience cannot sit for more than 2½ hours. Blame the embarrassing "coming soon to your local theatre" post script on Warners too. But see the film. It may be held over this weekend at Cinemalumiere but call to find out. It is definitely showing at the Revue Tuesday through Friday at 8:15 $1.75. At the Revue tonight and tomorrow is Ken Loach's screen adaptation of R.D. Laing's Sanity, Madness and the Family, né Family Life, but retitled Wednesday's Child for North American eyes. Sunday and Monday two nice Truffauts: Mississippi Mermaid and Stolen Kisses.

Ontario College of Art has an impressive Monday Night movie series for $1 a throw plus a one-time 50¢ membership fee. This week it's Tumbleweeds with William S. Hart (who was to William Boyd as William Boyd was to John Wayne). Coming up are films by many of the greats: Kurosawa, Bergman, Bunuel, Malle, Ray, Eisenstein and even our own Claude Jutra. Showings are at OCA just south of the campus at 100 McCaul, 7:30. For information call 366-4977 ext. 54.

Cinecity evidently has a student price of $1.50, or at least it does for Kamouraska, Jutra's new movie. Haven't seen it yet, but we're still glowing from Mon Oncle Antoine. Unfortunately the rest of the bevy of Canadian Features now in town (Between Friends, Paperback Hero, The Pyx and U-Turn) are at full price.

The Kensington at 565 College has a $1.25 repertory policy. So far nothing turns us on, although Wednesday's double-bill of Rebel Without a Cause and East of Eden is attractive. James Dean's is one of the few myths founded on real talent. He had an incredibly exciting presence that survives his old, bad movies.

At the 99¢ Roxy, Tuesday and Wednesday there's a funky double bill of Sid Ceaser's Ten from Your Show of

"Fidelio" crowns opera season

You've got only one chance left to see a superb production of Beethoven's Fidelio tonight. After Rigoletto, I thought I'd seen the best the Canadian Opera Company could possibly offer, but they have really topped all previous efforts with this production.

This was Beethoven's only opera, and whether or not he planned it that way, it stands as one of the most powerful, compassionate statements about freedom and justice ever written. Florestan, the imprisoned nobleman could be a Chilean revolutionary or a Soviet intellectual. Pizarro, the sadistic prison governor, could be a Greek Colonel or a Chilean general - the point is that Beethoven understood the banality of evil, and wrote this opera as his most humanistic statement against it.

On an artistic level, Fidelio's a tough opera to perform. There is no action worth speaking of, nothing like an Italian opera would have. The entire artistic success or failure depends on the singing ability of the performers, and ignoring this is fatal to the opera's believability and artistic worth.

Just as important is the acting. The characters are, in many ways, paradigms of operatic types. The music written for the prison governor is dark and evil, but the singer who takes this role has to act every bit as pathetic and cowardly as the singing typifies. Perhaps the singing isn't the sole criterion for success in this work, but without it any amount of acting is useless.

Just about all the performers were fully aware of this, and Carlos Alexander's direction must have great consistency to it to produce such uniformly accurate portrayals. In particular, William Wildermann (who gave such a knockout reading of Hagen's role in Gottterdammerung) was superb as Rocco, the jailer. He looked every bit the peasant who lives in fear of the governor, carrying out the orders he inwardly despises. His acting ability was ably complemented by his singing. His is a voice which cuts through nearly everything else on stage, always firm and commanding. This was his debut year with the Company - we can only hope for many more seasons of his magnificent bass voice and formidable acting ability.

The rest of the cast was excellent, particularly Jean Cox as Florestan, and Helly Jegid as Leonore, his wife, who disguises herself as Fidelio to get inside the prison to free her husband, a political prisoner.

Without a doubt, we're seeing the most impressive year the Canadian Opera Company has ever put together. And, with over 90% of the tickets sold for the six weeks, Herman Geiger-Torel must be happy, too. Toronto is ready for much more opera, year-round if at all possible.

As for Fidelio, if you like Beethoven but you've never heard anything beyond the fifth Symphony, Moonlight Sonata or Emperor Concerto, do yourself a favour and see this show. It'll make you an opera fan for life.

books

A fascinating, first-hand account of the Stalinist takeover in Russia is now once again available after having been long out of print.

It's From Lenin to Stalin, by Victor Serge, Monad Press, $2.95. Serge had a history in left circles in Europe before the Bolshevik Revolution, and went to Russia early in 1919. He became a member of the party and worked with the communist international. As Stalin consolidated his power, Serge threw in his lot with the left opposition. As a result he was subjected to increasing harassment and finally left the country in 1936, barely escaping the purge trials. In the west, he continued to write on the revolutionary movement. Some of his earlier works were seized and suppressed by the secret police before he left Russia, and have never been published.

The book is largely anecdotal rather than analytical, but precisely for this reason it may give a better taste of the flavour of the times than a drier academic treatment could.

The slanders, manipulations, murders, and other tactics of the Stalinist bureaucracy are all relatively well known, although not nearly as well as they should be—many of their lies are still believed. This book vividly describes their application.

But perhaps the most compelling part of the narrative is that portion dealing with the attitude of the old Bolsheviks to Stalin. Serge's description of their simple-minded faith in the party as a revolutionary instrument, which led them to remain loyal to it after it was completely taken over by Stalin and his henchmen in the mistaken belief that the party would survive any temporary aberrations forced on it by the leader, is powerfully revealing. This helps in part to explain the bogus confessions obtained from the victims of the Moscow trials.

It's a grim, gripping story. ud

theatre

And the shows go on! Night Freight and He Didn't Even Say Goodbye, two original Canadian plays, continue at the Backdoor Theatre. Clear Light, a new play by Toronto playwright Michael Hoolingsworth, is to be found at the Toronto Free Theatre on Berkeley Street. Structured like a jigsaw puzzle, the play is about the universe when the bottom falls out and explores the relationship of five people passing through a sexual netherworld into the void. Phone 368-2856 for reservations. And at the Poor Alex an original cabaret show The Group of Seven and The Case of the Glowing Pine fires away at the Canadian scene with clever variation and new zest.

Theatre Passe Muraille opened Noah's Ark on Wednesday. Written and directed by Hrnt Alianak, the play describes the memorable incidents of three crucial days of mirth and panic. Leaven of Malice, Hart House Theatre's first play of the season, premiered last night. Drawing on the resources and talents of the university, the production features a strong student/staff cast and is written by the University of Toronto's Robertson Davies.

Coming up next week are Kaspar at the Firehall Theatre and The Misanthrope at the St. Lawrence Centre. Peter Handke's Kaspar is an electrifying theatrical charade about a kind of societal wild child who gradually learns to speak. It opens Oct. 18. The Misanthrope by Molière, in a translation by Tony Harrison, previews tomorrow and Monday. It officially opens the St. Lawrence Centre repertoire for the year on Tuesday October 16. ss

Spoof asks Why did Laurier lie?

By CYNTHIA MCCARTHY

Does the 20th century, a period of "change, conflict and progressive music" belong to Canada, and if not then "why did Laurier lie?" These are two questions posed in the recent Poor Alex production of The Group of Seven and The Case of the Glowing Pine.

The cabaret-style show, is important both in terms of its comic excellence and its distinct Canadian flavour (as characterized by Labatt's 50 Ale). Indeed the humour is so Canadian, so much a product of the 20th century identity search, that one feels the satisfaction of enjoying an enormous private joke.

The RCMP, the Group of Seven, Brebeuf the Jesuit martyr, and other national folk heroes, receive no mercy in this more-than-a-mere-spoof rendition of Canadian history.

The mounties, "the men in the red coats with the shiny buttons and pointed hats" are first characters in a dream of a lonely Manitoba girl, misused by "belligerent Metis youth" and other "undesirables." The dream becomes reality when the red-coats appear, to "spread love and order everywhere". Within this skit is a hilarious scene in which Johnny Labatt, heir to the beer dynasty and graduate of University of Toronto Schools and Trinity College, is kidnapped by the "syndicate". Poor Johnny will lose his knuckles if his family refuses to relinquish the secret 50 formula. Although it is hinted that "50 is 50 because it is made from fresh roasted trilliums," Johnny's captors aren't satisfied - the heir still meets an unfortunate end. At his funeral "the man in the red sports jacket" and the pointed hat, stands as guardian of law and order.

Brebeuf, immortalized by E.J. Pratt in his epic poem, is seen in a somewhat different light in the routine called "It Came From Inuvik". He is portrayed as a 90-foot, white-haired, blue-skinned monster, come to clean up Toronto. The cleansing takes the form of a snow storm which is to last forty days and forty nights.

The birth of the Group of Seven's distinctly Canadian style, is parodied in a short story narrated by Toronto actress Fiona Reid. The new conception of painting is revealed to have been an error, created by a mixture of black loam, the blood of red ants, and the mark of a Goodyear boot heel, splattered over a landscape. Here exists the stuff of the Canadian identity - the need for a unique image, brutal nature lying at the root of the Canadian consciousness, and the need for industrial advancement (symbolized of course by the Goodyear boot heel).

Canadians Bill Peters and John McAndrew and Americans Joe Grifasi and Jim Burt, who created, direct and perform in The Group of Seven attack old strongholds with new vigour and new ones in a definitely unique way. The effect is exhilarating and hopefully indicative of the direction of Canadian theatre.

Bargains? Don't look at U of T

By TIM PINOS

It is popular folklore around the University of Toronto campus that the textbook store is absolutely the worst place to buy books. The textbook store has come under heavy criticism in the past for grossly inflated prices and short ordering.

However, as with all truisms, such as "All aspirin is alike", care should be taken before accepting or rejecting them at face value. In this case, while all aspirin are alike, the bookstore is not quite as bad as it is made out to be.

It is true that upon initial scrutiny, many of the books on sale at the textbook store are more expensive than at neighbouring outlets. The manager of the bookstore, John Taylor, freely admits that many of the more popular paperbacks, which are used in English and other humanities courses, can be bought at a store such as SCM far more cheaply, where there are discounts on paperback books.

Taylor points out, though that the student is mistaken if he thinks that he can get a similar bargain on hardcover texts. An economics text that costs $12.55 at the U of T store would set the student back over fourteen dollars at the SCM. On top of this the textbook store offers a 5 per cent discount on all hardcover texts.

The textbook stores downtown at Brindale and at Scarborough, and the University Bookroom

The Varsity - Michael Cowger

Hey, kid! It's about those textbooks under your coat!

are all operated as one arm of the University of Toronto Press. Until two years ago, any losses were absorbed by the U of T Press, but now the bookstores must pay their own way as a non-profit-making business.

Unlike other student services on campus, the bookstores must pay rent to the administration for the textbook store and bookroom buildings, and they must cover all salaries, overhead and advertising.

Many students have been caught in a bind when they have not been able to find the book they need at the textbook store. The bookstores operate on a policy of "guesswork" to try to figure out how many books should be ordered. The estimates of the books required for the courses are sent in by the professors, and are pared down before ordering, taking into account the number of used copies available, and the number of other sources.

In spite of this, often both the student and the bookstore are caught holding the short end of the stick. Taylor recalls when 130 texts were ordered for a philosophy course in which seven people ultimately enrolled. On the other side of the fence, students needing one of the new first-year economics texts have found the textbook store to be perpetually out of stock. According to Taylor, though, to order the full estimate of texts would be "instant bankruptcy".

The student on a tight book-buying budget will find himself hard-pressed to search out real alternatives to the University textbook store. By comparison, though, the bookroom located in Victoria College is a good deal, usually managing to undercut university prices. For example, a paperback that bore a manufacturer's list price of $1.85 retailed for $2.05 at the U of T store and $1.75 at Vic. However, the selection of books at Vic is restricted to the humanities.

Even as alternatives to the U of T textbook store are being mentioned, the question that students should be asking is not "where else can I buy books?", because for too many people the textbook store is the only place in town. The question, though, should be "why are students not being given the lowest possible prices?"

ATTENTION: STUDENTS WHO ARE IN CANADA ON A VISITOR'S OR STUDENT VISA AND WHO WISH TO APPLY FOR LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS

Under a recent amendment to the Immigration Act, persons in Canada on visitor's or student visas as of November 30, 1972, who have resided in Canada continuously since that date, may apply for landed immigrant status before October 15, 1973. Applications under this amendment will be assessed according to a special lenient set of criteria including length of residence, family relationships, employment record and compelling compassionate circumstances.

Consideration will also be given to applications from persons on student visas who have left Canada for a brief period since November 30, 1972, but who have otherwise maintained their residence here.

Students under contract to return to their countries of origin, and those who have received Minister's Permits are excluded from the provisions of the recent amendment.

Since this is the last chance non-residents will have to apply for landed immigrant status from within Canada, persons who wish to become permanent residents should register at the Canada Immigration Centre, 480 University Avenue, before OCTOBER 15, 1973.

Questions about applications for landed immigrant status under these amendments should be directed to:

Pedi-cars not flashy but fast

By TINA SREBOTNJAK

Wednesday was show-and-tell time at City Hall for people who are pushing a new way of getting around town - the People-Powered Vehicle, or the PPV.

Both commercial dealers and groups advocating more ecologically sound transportation methods than the 2,000 pound auto were extolling the merits of the $459 PPV and letting interested spectators try them out.

The PPV, which resembles a small dune buggy, is really a large enclosed tricycle built for two. But don't let that fool you - the PPV can attain (depending on the stamina you possess) speeds of up to 30 mph. It has a light polyethylene body which is extremely manoeuvrable and looks sporty.

The PPV is powered entirely by muscle. The three-speed transmission can be shifted at any time while either stopped, pedaling or coasting. Either person can pedal independently of the other. Steering is controlled from the left side by means of bicycle handlebars. The drum brake is located on the right side of the steering bar.

PPV's, like bicycles, require neither a license or plates. They are, in fact, classified as bicycles in that they are primarily for use on bikeways.

PPV's are manufactured in Detroit (where else). They are distributed in Canada through Mizzen Corporation, which sections out market areas to local representatives. These reps in turn set up local dealerships, as well as selling the PPV's themselves. In Toronto, they can be purchased from Karma II Retailers who are the reps for the Toronto-Bellelville-North Bay area.

Abner Brubachner, of Brubachner's Industrial Maintenance in Kitchener that works the southwestern section of Ontario, thinks the PPV is the vehicle of the future. At Wednesday's display of PPV's at City Hall, he was swamped with inquiries from potential dealers, one coming from as far away as Calcutta.

The incentive behind ideas such as the PPV is not a commercial one. Groups such as the Ontario Bikeway Coalition are 100 per cent behind the promotion of the PPV. The OBC, a Windsor-based group which is, according to president Norm Hawirko "the best lobby group

The Varsity - Bob Robinson

Ab Brubachner explains how to deal with these little vehicles. for cyclists in Ontario' is a non-profit development and resource group.

Hawirko, along with R. DeMers last year, after 3 months of planning, applied for and received a Local Initiatives Programme grant of $29,500. The group pushed for bikeways in Windsor and published a booklet, The Bikeway Idea, for all actively interested cyclists. They have set up numerous exhibits promoting cycling and physical fitness and are extremely optimistic about the future of the PPV.

Hawirko thinks Toronto has tremendous potential for a system of bikepaths. The OBC is trying to convince City Council that its long term planning must look to a saner approach to the preservation of our environment. The group hopes shortly to establish their head office in Toronto, probably on the U of T campus. Professor R. Jackson, of the Faculty of Forestry is an executive of the OBC.

The OBC is convinced that we must provide vehicular alternatives that will get us away from the car. As Hawirko said, "we have got to give people the opportunity to get out of those steel shit boxes."

The OBC plans to hold an organizational meeting for interested Torontonians within the next few weeks.

Boycott at Brock ends

ST. CATHARIENS (CUP) - Brock students ended their boycott of Saga Foods Ltd. after Saga rolled back prices on several items, especially low overhead, high volume commodities such as milk, donuts, toast and yogurt. However, students are prepared to resume the boycott in future if Saga refuses to cooperate. Explicit in this agreement is Saga recognition of the Food Committee, which the university has agreed will consist of 5 students, 2 administrators and faculty member. This is the only university committee of its kind and import with a student majority.

Students demanded Saga fulfill their food contract with residence students, which includes the quality of food served at meals, and unlimited seconds in the residence cafeteria.

The student food co-op grossed $950 in 3-1/2 days of operation, selling items between 5 and 25 cents. It has been turned over to the Brock Co-operative Child Care Centre.

General food prices will be reviewed by the food committee in November during Saga's quarterly review. At this time, high inflationary price increases not realized will be eliminated. Wholesale food prices have dropped by 6 per cent, and it is hoped Saga's prices will reflect this decrease. Students are now investigating the possibilities of a permanent food co-op on campus.

Last look: the Odeon might go

The Odeon Carlton Theatre can't be torn down tomorrow, but after November 12, Kuhl Construction can level the building, according to a court decision last week.

The Odeon Carlton, located at Yonge and Carlton, was designated an historic site by Toronto City Council two weeks ago. It is supposedly a rare breed of theatre, the "cathedral theatre", but is probably best known to the popcorn crowd for the movies and live organ music rendered by Colin Corbett every Friday and Saturday night.

Kuhl Construction Co. plans to construct two boxy apartment hotels on the theatre site, one 23 stories high, and another 30 stories high to match one that's already being built in a lot next to Maple Leaf Gardens that was a gaping hole for 15 years.

Kuhl applied for demolition before the period-piece theatre was designated historically significant, and was trying to force the city to issue a demolition permit immediately. If a building has been declared historically or architecturally significant by the City, there is a 60-day grace period between the application for demolition and the issuance of the demolition permit.

In the court decision last week, the city was granted that grace period, even though the building was declared historic after the application for demolition was made. Thirty-four days of the grace period remain.

In the meantime meetings are being conducted through Ward 4

Alderman Art Eggleton's office between lawyers for Kuhl, and representatives from the Canadian Opera Company and the National Ballet.

Both the National Ballet School and the Canadian Opera Company have expressed an interest in the theatre which has acoustics second only to the superb acoustics of Massey Hall.

Before the demolition permit is issued, parties interested in the building will try and come up with "a firm commitment that they want the building" and "definite proposals" for use of the building, a spokeswoman in Eggleton's office said.

However, according to a City Planning Board member, "the city is not involved in theatre". The City was already bamboozled once when it bailed out the O'Keefe Brewery with its white elephant the O'Keefe Centre, and is probably not interested in taking on the Odeon Carlton.

The North Jarvis Community Association's residents' group in the area is concerned about losing the building, but is also concerned at the prospect of 2,000 more people in an area that has virtually no parking space between Yonge and Sherbourne. The only open space is a token patch behind a Loblaw's store on Church Street.

According to North Jarvis Community Association member Sue Sparrow "there is not much to be done." The city has no power to stall demolition indefinitely, and only if enough interest is aroused could the building possibly be saved.

Kuhl Construction apparently bought the building about a year ago, and it looks like Dr. Julius Kuhl won't have to wait long before he can call in the wreckers. The seats are already being removed to be sent to a theatre in Vancouver.

Toronto shuts out Gryphons

By JOHN COBBY

The soccer Blues edged the Guelph Gryphons 1-0 Tuesday night in a lacklustre game in Guelph. A result other than a victory would have spelled Toronto's doom in the quest for first place; as it is, they live to fight another day.

The only goal of the game came almost immediately after the kickoff. Vince Ierullo picked up the ball on the edge of the Guelph penalty area after a mistake by the home defence. He dribbled his way towards goal only to be thwarted, at the expense of a corner, by the Gryphon's goalkeeper Sinanan.

Vito Polera's corner kick caused considerable confusion in the Guelph goalmouth, and the ball ran loose. Both Allen Caramancio and the keeper battled for the ball, with the former eventually forcing the ball through Sinanan's legs and into the net.

The scene was set for a rout, but the Blues appeared strangely unwilling to apply pressure to the shakey home defence. The Gryphons, for their part, were equally unwilling to concede another goal, and led in mid-field by Stevens, they fought back with strong running and an aggressive attitude. The superior skills of the Toronto team gave rise to good chances, but the finishing was indecisive.

Every now and then, the game sparked to life as first one team and then the other managed to show the urgency necessary to break the deadlock. For the final ten minutes the Blues pressured, only to have much of it nullified by offside calls, particularly when Tim Burns and Carmen Marcantonio in midfield had split the defence.

The second half commenced with more inauspicious play by both teams as players were unable to pass the ball to a colleague before being tackled; in many cases this resulted from poor ball control on the hard surface. Consequently, the defences tended to dominate the game.

Both coaches made changes to inject some life into the game. Guelph hoped to unsettle the Toronto defence with Norton's height while they replied with Dave Evans and Elvy Zanette to provide urgency. Aside from brief flashes, neither side managed to ignite.

The Blues were probably tired, since they were playing their fourth game in six days. In spite of lackadaisical play in this game, they have become a very sound team defensively, with only six goals conceded in eight games, and 17 tallied.

Law wins in rugby, PHE eyes Mulock

Rugby by Neil Sorbie

Trinity B defeated Engineering II 13-0 last Friday. Both sides had very loose play and Trinity seemed to depend mainly on the strong running of Dave Rose. Trin took an early lead in the game when Dan Van Alstine made good on a penalty kick from the 25.

Play moved from one end of the field to the other with neither side able to dominate. Finally, Rose ran the ball up the blind side of a scrum at his own 25 and scored between the posts. Van Alstine converted to give Trinity a half-time lead of 9-0.

In the second half Rose showed tremendous broken-field running by dodging his way through the entire engineering squad and scoring his second try. The conversion was missed for a final of 13-0.

On Wednesday Law hammered PHE B 22-0. Law's team was bolstered considerably with the addition of three players with Blues experience. Robert Gourlay led the scoring a try and three drop-kicked conversions for a total of 10; Ken Watts added two tries for eight, and Terry Dalgleish rounded out the tally with a try.

The referee failed to show for the PHE A - Trin A encounter yesterday and with their own manager refereeing, Trins still bowed to the jocks' heavier squad. Ken Sullivan scored the only try of the game by kicking a beautiful 'up and under' which he recovered on his own and then dived in for the only try of the game to give PHE the win, 4-0.

Football by Chris Robinson

Phys Ed looks ready to run away with the first division, at least on the first half results. After a close early win over defending champs St. Mikes they iced Eng 27-0 on TD's by Rumble, Dennis, Marchione and Curran, and three converts by Nedoshytko.

The game was closer this week against Vic, although the score was again a shut-out, 11-0. Butter-fingered pass receivers repeatedly stalled a potentially explosive Vic offence. Vic is still the best bet to upset PHE since they have plenty of spirit, exemplified by 00 (Licensed to Kill) Johnson, who tried to take on the whole jock squad after a late tackle.

Against the Mikes the Vic team fared better by sticking to the ground with sweeps and end runs. Powerful running by Mike Cork and Hotrum produced majors for them, while Landeryou kicked a single. For SMC, sadly depleted from last year's team, MacLean replied with a safety touch, and Joe 'The Toe' Liscio booted two singles.

In the other first division game the hapless plumbers bowed to the Mikes 35-14 on route to another winless season. Engel left the revolution long enough to nail down two sixes while Ouszek, Klein and Popp settled for one each and Liscio escaped from the soccer team long enough to collect five on converts and singles. For the losers Cornell and Pankew tallied majors and Montgomery got two for something.

In the second division New scraped by Meds in a close 9-8 game that could foreshadow the play-offs. Saikely with a field goal and Marijosius with a TD counted for the gnus against the doctors Burus with a TD and Russell with a safety.

Trinity opened the season by taking Scarborough 12-0 on unconverted majors by Howes and Oliver. UC managed to burn them the next game on a punt runaway by Randy, but they then took control on powerful running by Poulos for two unconverted majors. In the dying minutes the Redmen went almost the whole field on two passes and two sweeps for their second TD by Rose. A convert by Young, plus his earlier single totalled a 14-12 win over the Trinity Longhorns.

Meds continued their winning ways by stuffing Forestry into a hollow tree, 31-14. For the winners Seppala, Russell, Howcroft, Bridgle, and Saffery counted majors Bluesy notching a field goal and two converts. The axemen replied with TD's from Clark and Sissen, and two converts, also by Sissen.

Pistol Picks: New over Scar by 16; UC over Scar by 9; PHE over SMC by 5.

Soccer by Jock Raunt

In soccer all three divisions are developing into chaos. Erindale had been ripping up the first division. Last week they munched UC 4-0 on a pair by Li, and singles from di Gennaro and Lewitsky. Vic was going to be a doormat but they took them 3-2 on markers from Williams, John and Barbosa, with the losers getting scores from Ngan and Li.

Williams again, and Paul led Vic to a 0-0 shoutout over St. Mikes A. Meanwhile, Sr. Eng. (Pereira, Kozaki) slipped by Scar (Wessio), and hammered UC 5-0 (Kirk 3, Pereira, Grey). Scarborough is the hard-luck story of the league. Leading St. Mikes 1-0 in the second half this week, their top player, Morra, bought twelve stitches over the eye and they collapsed for three by Facchini, Holland, and Bubrin to lose 3-1.

In the second division St. Mikes B bombed Dents 7-3 on goals by Racco (3), Lamouesek, Carubia, Desemini, and Maragoni. Palermo counted a hat-trick for the losers. The micks and the gnus then played to a 0-0 tie this week.

Meds continued their title-defence with a 2-0 shut-out of Jr Eng (Klar, Saffrey), who then bounced back to kill the lawmen 2-0 on goals by Moy and Lam.

The third is wholly confused. Pharmacy continue riding high with 2-0 (Muti 2) over Architecture and 3-0 (Stenger 2, Czyzewski) over Forestry. Eng III took a strong Innis squad on a forfeit, then drew (Yum, Yiu) 2-2 with Forestry (Sarafyn, McGowan). Duker, Brown, Stewart, and Foster led Grads to a 4-0 win over Arch.

Tom de Wolf scored all the Trinity goals as they beat Know 1-0 in a tight match, then gave away a tie 2-2 to Emmanuel (Martindale, Haughton). Knox used their in with the powers to squeak a 2-1 win over Innis. Chipangwi and Codling tallied for the divines, Alonzo for Innis.

Crying all the way to the bank

By BOB BETTSON

The University of Toronto made a profit of over $1.2 million on university and student services and over $90,000 on student residences and food services last year.

The figures were contained in a confidential financial statement produced by the university administration and submitted to the Governing Council. The figures are for the calendar year ending April 30, 1973.

The profit on residences and food services is from University College and New College residences operated by the university. The federated college residences (Victoria, St. Mike's and Trinity) were not included in the budget.

The financial statements for the year 1972-3 also reveal that over $90 million of the $152 million was spent for academic expenses, mainly staff salaries. Another $23.7 million was spent on physical plant and administration and $22 million on research.

Revenue includes over $94 million in grants from the Ontario government and $17.3 million in student fees.

The university is also helping the U of T Press with a loan of $826,000. This is conveniently financed from trust and endowed funds. The report doesn't say if this loan is interest-free.

Recently the university has been trying to close down a non profit printing and publishing firm in the basement of the SAC building. Meanwhile they appear to be subsidizing their own printing operation. The university claims the SAC operation would violate the zoning laws while their own firm does not.

The university's physical assets were valued at over $528 million. This figure includes land building and equipment on the downtown campus and the two suburban campuses.

A profit of $1 million on the St. George campus is used to finance deficits of $300,000 at Erindale and $700,000 at Scarborough.

The report also shows that the university owns the lands and buildings of Sunnybrook Hospital on Bayview Avenue, which the university acquired for $1 and leases back to the hospital.

OFS still limping along after fees strike failure

By BOB BETTSON

Despite the failure of its widely publicized fees strike campaign last year, the Ontario Federation of Students is still intact. After its first year of operation, it is trying to consolidate its position as a province-wide student organization.

Going into last weekend's general meeting in London, the federation included all Ontario universities except McMaster, Wilfrid Laurier and Laurentian, which pulled out last year.

Research co-ordinator Paul Axelrod now hopes that since the federation has survived its first year it will stay together. Last year's fees strike campaign protesting the Ontario government's $100 fee increase and student aid policies caused a great deal of dissension over tactics and strategy which threatened to split the organization apart.

Now the federation will do more research with an expanded budget which allows for three full time workers including a fieldworker, a research co-ordinator and an executive co-ordinator.

Axelrod is researching the history of the student movement, student financing as well as service operations. Though a lot of attention has been directed at the Commission on Post-Secondary Education report, he feels that it is "no longer the focus of changes".

On the financing question Axelrod thinks the Ontario government is moving toward having students pay a larger part of the university cost. "We must oppose this at every step, we need information more than anything else and we're starting to develop sources inside the Ministry of Colleges & Universities", he said.

OFS now includes only one community college, Fanshawe college in London, but increasing membership of community colleges across the province will be another focus for future development. "It's important that they be included," Axelrod stated.

One of the thorny problems OFS faces as it goes into its second full year is the difficulty in policy formulation procedures. As it stands now each member student council must ratify any decision made by an OFS executive or general meeting. Axelrod feels that this limits the ability of the federation to function effectively. "It takes a long time for decisions to be made and this leaves a vacuum. For the organization to be effective policies ratified at general meetings must be carried out."

Although the main priorities of the federation have been in the financing field, more research is being done into student housing, teaching methods, promotion and tenure and non-Canadian professors in Ontario universities.

Another problem the federation has run into is communication with students. As a constituent organization Axelrod points out "our relations with students are no better than the relations of student councils with students on their own campuses".

One attempt to communicate with students is through the publication of the "Ontario Student", a newspaper which will be published six times this year with a circulation of 25,000. Articles are being solicited from individual councils on various issues.

However OFS is still hamstrung by its limited ability to act as a cohesive movement. The executive is scattered all across Ontario and only meets infrequently.

The federation has "established its presence and representivity on a provincial level", he said and pointed to parity representation gained for students and faculty at an upcoming Ontario-wide conference on instructional development later this month.

The conference last weekend discussed the OFS brief to the Council of Ontario Universities and take a position on the issue of student participation in hiring, firing and tenure committees and the existence of tenure in it's present form.

This comes as a result of a searching analysis during the summer of the failure of last year's fees strike campaign and the tactics used. The executive's report on last year concluded that the federation could be more effective by adopting study sessions research and lobbying techniques than mass demonstrations and occupations.

Plainclothes police disrupt simulated sex show in Deep Throat, Saskatchewan.

Deep Throat cut at U of T showing

By DICK BROWN

Three U of T students face criminal charges of "exposing an obscene movie to public view" following a Friday night raid by Metro police on a SAC-sponsored movie screening.

The movie, Deep Throat, has been declared obscene in some US court districts, but it has never been ruled on by a Canadian court, said Clayton Ruby, a lawyer representing two of the students.

The arrests were made Friday night after the second showing of the film at the Medical Sciences anatomy lecture hall. Plainclothes police seized the film and laid the charge before a third unscheduled showing of the film was to have been made.

Ruby said his defence on the charges will be based on the distinction between profit and non-profit ventures. He said the film was part on an on-going non-profit series sponsored by SAC.

"It's unfair to put all the blame on three students who were arrested," Ruby said. "The movie was brought in by the Students' Administrative Council and had their approval."

"Admission was only one dollar and nobody made a profit. The distributor only asked $500 or half the gate."

Ruby said: "It's no Yonge Street.

It's the proper function of a university to educate people...it's not criminal to educate."

"The showing of movies like this which are part of an on-going educational film series comprising of classic and uncontroversial films is not directed at pornographic and prurient interests."

Ruby said the three charged students are to appear in court Oct. 26 to be remanded to a date at which a trial date will be set. He expects the trial to take place sometime early next year due to crowded court dockets.

Before the accused could be convicted, two points would have to be established: First, the court would have to rule the film as obscene, and second the accused would have to be found guilty. Ruby plans to fight both points.

Ruby says SAC is supporting the students and is footing their legal defence costs.

Charged in the incident were: Taras Babiak; Lawrence Weisbrod, UC SAC rep; and David Galbraith, SAC education commissioner.

Ruby has appealed to faculty members present at Friday night's screening of Deep Throat at the Medical Sciences auditorium to be in contact with his office, at 964-9664.

This would be for information gathering purposes only and implies no obligation.

Women exploited: Conway

By HEATHER SANGUINS

"As far back as we can trace in statistics (about the twelfth century) women have always been paid less than men for the same work — approximately 50 per cent that paid to men," U of T Internal Affairs Vice-President Jill Conway said Wednesday night. She added there was "no answer for this" speaking at the crowded Women's Studies lecture at the Ontario College of Education.

Conway introduced her lecture saying that women's changing role in the family was an "enormous subject" to be dealt with in an hour, and then outlined the history and evolution of the woman's role. She said that before the industrial revolution "women contributed about 50 per cent of the total household budget" through spinning, clothes making, cultivating garden plots, and outside farm labor.

Conway stated however that women's role began to decline before the industrial revolution occurred. Immediately afterward women assumed a "large" but extremely localized role in retailing, i.e. shopkeeping.

She pointed out that from 1790 to 1815, when industry first started in the New England colonies, there were 120 women to 100 men. Thus single women were utilized as a central source of industrial labor.

After the industrial revolution the economic status of women declined further. Conway attributed this to the cheap pool of male immigrant labourers, to the union policy of excluding women from high paying jobs. Also critical was the male control of hiring.

Conway stated that in all industries the wages of women were "approximately one-third of men's" when they were carrying out the same work. But the trend was lower pay for more menial work.

Conway quoted the first social surveys of working class families in American industrial cities in 1910 as recording a working woman's average contribution to the household budget as being 15 per cent. She concluded that "this change in economic status has meant that the political consciousness of women has declined" and their self view as marginal domestics has "increased".

Throughout her academic career Conway has done extensive research into the situation of women in North American society.

'Students need crap-detector'

By BARRY WEISLEDER

"Teachers should equip students with a shock-proof crap-detecting system," and in a culture as fast-changing as ours "education must provide students with perspective."

So argued American reform-educator Dr. Neil Postman, author of "Teaching as a Subversive Activity," during a meeting at the Ontario College of Education building attended by more than 500 people on Friday.

Throughout the informal dialogue format, Postman stressed that "competence as a question-asker is all one needs to acquire knowledge". However, the kind of question one asks is crucial.

He said that a classroom survey he conducted recently revealed that most teachers at the post-secondary level habitually ask "what am I thinking" type questions. In turn, students are given to asking administrative-type questions, like "must I use a pen" and "how long is the composition to be."

The type of question that is generally avoided and/or not answered is "why are we doing this?", which is most central to developing critical capacity in both asker and respondent.

Dr. Postman was quick to point out that the ideas that underlie his criticisms were by no means original. The slowness of change in education along the lines of his critique he attributed to the resistance of broader institutions in society and those who have an interest in defending them.

Short of changing the "larger system", Postman suggested that teachers can be "subversive" (which he defines as knowledge-seeking) only in individual terms. For example, teachers may, he argued, refrain from practicing traditional modes of evaluation, or aspects of them, but for the majority this is done always at the risk of being fired. He advanced no political strategy for going beyond this problem.

Dr. Postman appealed to teachers to break from traditional practices in terms of their own roles too.

He urged, for example, math teachers to teach English periodically, and English teachers to teach music, and so on, so that teachers can see what it is like to teach something that they don't know already—so that they might ask questions, the answers to which they are not familiar with.

This broadening of perspective, he contended, would gladly assist the learning process, and help to break down artificial distinctions between students and teachers.

In Postman's view, teachers must come to grips with the fact that they are "amateurs", whom if we wanted, could be "given a basic understanding of what we know learning is about in a six week course."

Following the educator's talk, about 300 College of Education students met in the same auditorium at the call of their student union.

They received information on the teacher moratorium on participation in extracurricular activities to take effect by October 22 in all Metro publicly funded high schools, organized by the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation.

The aim of the high school teacher boycott of non-curricular duties is job security and better working conditions, as well as the right to negotiate those conditions.

Those in attendance decided to plan to have another meeting to which would be invited an OSSTF official to discuss federation policy in this period, and the appropriate course for student-teachers in this situation.

The divine right has settled on King Barry I of Wallace House, UC. He was installed without violence at an old UC ritual this weekend.

Board copes with boycott

By BARRY WEISLEDER

While secondary school teachers across Metro will be engaged in a full boycott of extra-curricular school activities by October 22, the Toronto school board will be encouraging a "business as usual" atmosphere.

The work-to-rule campaign has been organized by the Ontario Secondary Schools Teachers' Federation (OSSTF) in its fight for teacher job security and better working conditions, and primarily against the provincial government's budget ceilings.

At its last meeting Thursday, the Toronto Board of Education adopted a number of measures to "cope" with the teacher action. The trustees decided that high school commencement activities may be performed as planned, without teacher participation, where there is "community" demand to do so.

In relation to after-school hour clubs, dances, student councils, drama, music, sports, etc., the board suspended the requirement for staff sponsorship for such activities. Instead, principals (who are also OSSTF members) have been given responsibility for sanctioning school activities and the use of equipment until 6 pm each school day in the city. Senior students and students' councils are being encouraged to organize their own extra-curricular activities where this is possible. It is noteworthy that the trustee's sudden and unprecedented appreciation of student initiative arises in the context of the teacher protest action.

Discussion of teachers' work to rule tactic was quite heated, and provided a ready platform for anti-union school trustees. Former board chairman William Ross (Ward 9) argued that Toronto's 902 night school teachers ought to be relieved of their duties until the moratorium is lifted, so that they might support their colleagues' protest efforts "without denigrating themselves."

Another former chairman, Bill Charlton (Ward 5), rallied against OSSTF discipline in carrying out the work to rule, saying he felt "professionalism" would suffer in the process, and that it might be better after all if the students had less contact with the more militant teachers.

A motion to advertise for adult volunteers from the community to organize extracurricular activities was defeated. The board went on to safely cover its bases by going on record as supporting the minimum goal of the teachers' moratorium, that is, a return to the staffing formula of 1972-73 by September 1974.

However, only a written guarantee to that effect from the Metro school board (on which Toronto has six representatives) would act to lift the Metro work to rule by secondary school teachers, according to Coline Gardhouse, President of OSSTF District 15. She vainly appealed to the Toronto trustees to make such a written guarantee, to win the Metro board to a similar position, and to turn the fight against the provincial government.

In other action at the meeting, the mood was sufficiently grim to lead to the overturning of the board's recent decision not to endorse the United Way fund-raising campaign.

With the corporate philanthropists standing in the wings, and conservative pressure mounting in the form of hostile letters, phone calls and editorials in the mass dailies, the trustees succumbed, but asked ever-so-politely that next year United Way officials approach the board earlier so that pertinent questions about the campaign's methods and long range effectiveness may be put and answered. However, a specific motion to this effect, by Doug Barr (Ward 7) was tabled until the 1973 fund drive is over.

The trustees also agreed to distribute through the schools a second piece of literature in support of the United Way from the People Concerned About People Committee.

Aliens land tonight

Midnight tonight is the deadline for illegal immigrants in Canada since last Nov. 30 to come forward and apply for landed immigrant status inside of Canada.

Starting tomorrow, illegal immigrants who have not registered during the government's grace period will be subject to deportation without right of appeal.

Any student who has been in Canada, legally or illegally, since Nov. 30 is also eligible for the grace period and must register by today, immigration officials said.

Criteria to obtain landed immigrant status is much easier, and both immigration officials and independent immigration counsellors have reported high rates of success for applicants under the grace period rules.

Racism, brutality charged at Artistic

By TIM GALLAGHER

Just hours before the Students' Administrative Council (SAC) held a rally in support of strikers at two Artistic Woodwork plants in North York, the strikers at those plants levelled charges of sexism, racism, and brutality at Metro Police.

Recently, pickets said that it has become apparent that women on the line have received the worst treatment from police. On Wednesday, three women were arrested. They felt that police now believe they can intimidate women, who make up a good percentage of picketers, into giving up the strike.

The workers, members of Canadian Textile and Chemical Union, have been on strike since August 21. Key issues in the dispute are job security and union recognition by the company.

Negotiations resumed briefly last week on Wednesday and Friday, the first talks since the strike began. But the talks broke off Friday after failure to reach any agreement. The union is planning to beef up its picket line this week.

Racism is another tactic that police employ, strikers said. One woman, Mieta Purnis, an Italian worker who protested an arrest, was ignored by one officer who told her to speak English because "this is Canada and we are Canadians."

She commented to the press that she "was speaking English but he (the officer) probably detected my foreign accent." A picket who was arrested the next day, was called a "bloody Irishman" by police at the station.

Union officials have charged that police have allowed management and scabs to mistreat the pickets. Last week, a picket was struck by a truck at the Artistic Woodwork plant on Denison Avenue.

Police were called to the scene of the accident but the driver involved was nowhere to be found. Even though the picketer required hospital treatment, police claimed they could not lay charges against the driver because of "conflicting evidence."

This week, in a similar situation, a picket was tossed upon the hood of a car that attempted to gun its way through the picket line. The police, numbering over 15, claimed they didn't witness the incident. However, they did see the picketer sprawled upon the car, and charged him with obstruction.

Furthermore, courts have imposed bail restrictions which deny picketers with second arrests, the right to return to the picket line. Thursday, the courts reversed this decision by unconditionally releasing two persons with a second arrest. It seems the police wanted to avoid another encounter with union lawyers who have appealed to the Supreme Court on such cases, union spokesmen have said.

The arrests now total 60. The strikers have persistently opposed strikebreaking efforts by police. Their union has won the backing of the Bricklayers and Masons union and members of the Teamsters.

Board of Education fiddles while teachers burn.

The Varsity—Mike Gagner

SAC will offer you a cheaper way to fix your psychological scholastic woes. If an intensely boring prof with four books to his name is the source of your problem, you have a chance to fight it.

Achtung! The Varsity tells you vote

Students at this university are being asked to vote in a referendum Wednesday and Thursday on questions concerning athletics, staffing, and the National Union of Students. The referendum is being sponsored by the Students' Administrative Council.

If student unionism and collective decision-making is to mean anything on this campus in the near future, students should take the time—it's very little trouble—to get out and cast a ballot. It's free, and although the SAC isn't bribing the voters with money or liquor, the campus politicos do promise results if the referendum receives a high enough positive vote on any or all questions.

At this point in time we have to throw our support behind the SAC—not unreservedly, mind you, but at least the referendum is a step—albeit a small one—back along the road toward some semblance of student unity, and (dare we mention the words) perhaps even "student power". (But in all fairness to the SAC we'd like to warn them that our support might just mean the kiss of death, except from our few-and-far-between loyal fans, or course.)

The athletics question must receive a strong positive vote if it's to have any meaning at all to the Simcoe Hall bureaucrats and the conservatives in the athletics department. It may be the last chance we have to express our disappointment and disapproval at the sham effort the administration at this university has made in physical education. While a few blocks away at Ryerson a task force composed of seven faculty and seven students (that's known as parity, folks) has been meeting to discuss reorienting that school's physical education program, the U of T administration pulled yet another in a series of heavy-handed tricks and set up a task force to study athletics over the summer with no students represented (unless you count Paul Cadario as a student). Not only that, the administration also saw fit to lease Varsity arena to the profit-oriented Toronto Toros over the summer without student participation in decision-making.

The SAC referendum will be asking the question: "Do you support the establishment of a student majority on a unified directorate governing men's and women's athletics at the University of Toronto." We think should students a reply affirmatively. After all, isn't it about time, athletes made decisions about athletics at this university? They do elsewhere? — at Queen's for example. Right now control rests with faculty members and athletic administrators. The system appears all the more unjust when you consider that students paid for over half the athletics operating budget last year with absolutely no subsidy from anywhere. Wouldn't it be nice to have facilities and programs run for the mass of students on this campus rather than an elitist few? And wouldn't it be nice to be able to walk over to Varsity Arena with a friend some winter evening for some recreational skating without being bussed to some far-off arena by Johnny F.Bassett and the Toronto Toros? It's your choice. A unified directorate with parallel men's/women's structures, and a majority of students could make the difference. The administration is afraid of a large turn-out, so exercise what little power you have at this university and vote.

The second part of the referendum asks the question "Do you support student representation on bodies making decisions with regard to the hiring, promotion, salary, granting of tenure, and dismissal of faculty members?" And a supplementary question asks: "Do you support equal faculty/student representation on these staffing bodies?" Again we would support an affirmative vote on both questions. How many times have students had to sit in a lecture reduced to reading The Varsity because of a professor's boring lecture based on his 1954 lecture notes? Wouldn't you like to be able to throw away this excuse for journalism and be able to be interested in something a professor said? Well then, student participation in who gets hired will help achieve these goals. Right now professors are judged on how much they publish and their ability and willingness to undertake administrative duties, not on the basis of teaching.

Early last week we wrote supporting a "parallel structures" form of parity—whereby students would meet separately from faculty, with each body eventually making a decision on staffing, but each ultimately having no veto power. We still believe that system is the best one, at least initially, until both estates—student and faculty—gain far more respect for each other than exists at the present time, and until students begin to have the (good) sense not to be co-opted or to lose touch with the students who elected them. However, the parity system proposed by the SAC—students and faculty seated together on staffing committees in equal members, is better than no parity status at all and we would, therefore, have to support the SAC position, although somewhat critically.

Finally, we would have to remain consistent with our other positions and support the entrance of SAC into the National Union of Students. If the organization proves to be half as good as the old Canadian Union of Students, it'll be cheap at one-third the price (NUS will cost each student at U of T 30 cents out of the already-paid SAC fees, while the CUS levy was $1).

Although we don't feel the reformism attempted by any national student union is a major step toward progressive social change, we think it's about time students started getting together again to protect what rights they do have under the present system. After a period of 43 years, Canada has been without a national student union for the past three years, and we believe that is long enough period of reflection before attempting reunification.

Whatever you think, at least vote on Wednesday or Thursday. But a negative vote in the referendum hurts no one but the person dropping the ballot in the box and his fellow students. Don't expect "radical social change" to come from a referendum—it doesn't—but it's one small step at least. Don't you think it's time for students on this campus to once again make a few commitments to themselves?

Library workers not so satisfied

Just a few words in response to the article in the October 1 Varsity on the Sir George Williams' library workers strike. Generally, the article was quite good. It pointed out that the militancy of the Sir George library workers was a response to poor working conditions and low wages. Also, the support they have received from students and faculty is encouraging. It is the introduction to the article that I would like to object to:

"U of T administration has had many problems in the past with library policy.... One of the problems that U of T hasn't had lately is a strike by library workers, who appear satisfied."

Here are a few facts about the situation of U of T library workers:

- Starting pay for a Library Technician 2 (the lowest job classification) is $4,664 a year, around $88 a week. Many library workers are university graduates with B.A.'s and M.A.'s, who find, like most university graduates, that their degrees are next to meaningless on the job market.
- Many library workers learned skills or received education in other countries, and have found, that like most immigrant workers, their qualifications and experience mean nothing here and they must start at the bottom again. In many cases, immigrant workers are concentrated in the lowest job classifications, doing the most tedious jobs (for instance, filing in the card catalogues).
- The annual turnover rate is very high - in some departments as high as 50 per cent - as a result of the low pay, poor working conditions, and boring work.
- University employees, including the unionized library staff, have no sick leave plan aside from the 14 day a month allotment.
- There are many cases of staff being off work due to serious illness or accident, for several months, without receiving a penny from the university.
- In order to keep the library open seven days a week including every week night til 12, staff in the public service areas work a strange assortment of shifts, including Saturdays and Sundays.
- Over the summer in the old library building, the temperature often reached 90 degrees and the humidex reading was 105 on many occasions. The Sigmund Samuel and Sci-Med Libraries desperately need air-conditioning, for the well-being of the books, not to mention the workers, but as yet there is no definite word about whether they plan to instal an air-conditioning system.

These are just a few of the conditions under which U of T library staff work. The similarities with conditions for Sir George Williams workers are striking. As for the statement that U of T Library workers are "satisfied", here are a few facts that would indicate otherwise:

- Over four years ago, library workers unionized (CUPE Local 1230), to secure regular wage increases, certain guaranteed benefits, and to protect themselves against arbitrary management policies.
- In the last few months, since the move to the Robarts, "dissatisfaction" has increased, as working conditions have on the whole worsened.
- There is no staff cafeteria for approximately 600 workers. It was cut out in an "economy drive". The only food available is in the second floor "vending machine cafeteria", which is for the use of library workers and the public. By the time we get down there for lunch, most of the seats are taken.
- The public service areas are carpeted and wood-panelled the mahogany was imported from Ghana at a cost of $200 per panel, we have heard), whereas the staff work areas are mainly grey concrete and tile.
- By far the most serious thing that the Robarts hasn't provided for its workers is decent health care facilities. There are no fully equipped sick room facilities. There are presently no people trained to handle accidents and emergencies on the part of staff or the public. Band-aids and iodine just don't do the trick. When there have been accidents - on the job, or cases of sudden illness, the closest help at hand is an ambulance, which has often taken up to one-half hour to arrive. In the last few years, two library workers have died before arrival at the hospital. It is not possible to know if these deaths could have been avoided with better health care facilities, including a supply of oxygen; but certainly, these deaths show that preventive measures are called for.

Many departments are seriously understaffed, the result again of budget cuts and economy drives in what are considered less crucial areas. The result of this is that library workers are often seriously overworked, and the service to the public deteriorates.

Since the opening of the Robarts, several petitions have circulated among the library workers pointing out many of these conditions, and demanding immediate changes.

Our contract expired as of July 1, but as yet, we have no definite answers to our contract demands: wage increases, a cost of living clause, a health care plan that guarantees an income in the case of serious illness or accident, some union say in job classification. Library staff are becoming increasingly impatient and angry about the contract negotiations dragging on (our last contract took eight months to negotiate), particularly since inflation has long ago eroded the wage increases we won two years ago.

The Varsity has carried many articles about campus issues that try to expose the nature of the university and who it serves. There have also been many articles recently about broader social and political issues (the situation of California grape pickers and Toronto's immigrant workers) which expose the conditions of workers and national minorities in a society geared to profit and not human need. At the University of Toronto, I would suggest that one of the truest indicators of the nature of this institution and its priorities, is how it treats its own workers.

Unite behind alternative to discipline code

The administration wants to foist its new code of discipline on the U of T by taking advantage of student passivity and divisions. Together with some defensible enough provisions regarding academic offences in the Code is the notorious clause forbidding demonstrations, etc. which "disrupt or obstruct unduly authorized activities or functions held by the university".

We have no confidence at all that this clause can realistically be "interpreted away", as SAC president Anderson appears to favour attempt to do. It clearly gives a blank cheque to its enforcers to call anything "disruptive" that they choose. The clause must be rejected outright, and something better must be put in its place.

In fact, there already is something better available on this subject, namely the 1969 report of the Campbell joint committee on disciplinary procedures, endorsed in principle by the administration and by SAC at the time it was issued. This report recognized that demonstrations are primarily a political, not a disciplinary, matter and that they may well be justified. It divided all on-campus demonstrations into three types:

- (1) non-disruptive demonstrations "which do not interfere with the performance of the essential educational functions of the University" (nothing about administrative functions);
- (2) disruptive demonstrations that are not "violent or destructive in character" but "simply obstructive";
- (3) demonstrations which actually are violent or destructive.

The report stressed the importance of dealing with demonstrations of type (2) by settling the basic issues behind them through negotiations, referendums, or other such political means, and emphasized that "a resort to force by the University should occur only after other reasonable alternatives have failed".

Unless our representatives in SAC and the GSU can unite behind some alternative, such as this one, to the authoritarian "disruption" clause in the present code, the authoritarian position may well win out, in effect, by default.

At any rate, since the discipline code is a code of behaviour for students and faculty, nothing should be agreed to that is not the product of drafting by representatives of the student and faculty bodies. The administration's job is to administer, not to lay down the basic rules.

Silly engineers offend reader

Last week I was subjected to the sight of a group of University of Toronto "engineers" parading around like idiots selling, or trying to sell, Kraft cheese, Dare cookies, and California grapes. Needless to say I was quite shocked at the insensitivity and the boorish attitude of the people who made up that group.

Let me give you an example of their childishness. While I was observing the actions of this "responsible" group of students, someone nearby demanded if they knew that little children were being forced, as slaves, to pick the grapes that they were selling. One of the "engineers" replied and he and his friends laughed about this one! that the grapes tasted better when little children picked them. Now that is the most immature and foolish comment that I have ever heard. And these people are supposed to be professionals. Aren't professionals supposed to be respected, responsible people, aware of our social problems, and willing to help, not ridicule and hinder just causes?

In my opinion the members of that group were demonstrating their ignorance of and their flippant attitude towards the political and social struggles which should concern us all.

Student unionism's wobbly future

By BOB GAUTHIER

A National Union of Students could be a first step toward the long road back to the student unity of the 1960's in Canada, if the member organizations deal with concrete issues and do not try to avoid contentious topics. The birth pangs of NUS smack strongly of weakness. The organization, its structure and composition, appears to be over-reacting to the negative late 60's experience of the Canadian Union of Students structure and leadership (CUS died in 1969).

The founders of the NUS deliberately decentralized the organization to avoid one major flaw that led to the demise of CUS. Under its present structure the member organizations alone can make policy, while the staff and Central Committee can only carry it out. Central Committee members are volunteers, and each province has at least one member so that accessibility is guaranteed. The founding members appear to be over-reacting, however, for in designing the system to prevent the formation of an isolated clique of radical "intellectuals" (divorced from solid ideas of strategy and practise) at the top of NUS, the organization appears to be so decentralized that there is a leadership vacuum — "participatory democracy" at its somewhat absurd best.

A national organization of students — any organization — can do little by itself as an organizing vehicle for the restructuring of society, but it can serve as a body through which more progressive groups can channel their energies and perhaps have some impact. But it should be kept in mind that a national organization along NUS lines is by no means a radical body, but merely an appendage of the parliamentary liberal-democratic system (i.e. status quo oriented). It seeks to change within the system through acting virtually as a parliamentary lobby group. And for this reason it doesn't go far enough. Where CUS failed because it went too far too fast and thus became counter-productive to its own goals, NUS seems to be timidly avoiding (as yet) any controversial issues. Its function so far seems to be less a leadership stance than a follower of member organizations stance. While the resultant decentralization may have positive effects in terms of a national organization more attuned to its member constituencies, one cannot but wonder whether a "happy-medium" between the "push-pull" tasks of leadership-following can be established. Perhaps one of the real questions to ask is: is a seemingly toothless national organization better than no organization at all? (The cost to students is 30 cents a head).

Nevertheless, any way you cut it, there are some immediate, piece-meal advantages of a National Union of Students — lobbying, information, and organization.

For example, although the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) and the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT) maintain offices in Ottawa to provide lobbying services for their member organizations, there has been no national lobby for post-secondary students since 1969. And as a result, since 1969 there has been little or no legislation favorable to students. A stronger, better-knit organization other than the regional Ontario Federation of Students is needed to bring pressure to bear on the provincial and federal governments on such issues as last year's raised loan ceiling and tuition hike. With the resources of a national union behind them students might conceivably have exerted more pressure on Queen's Park last fall.

A national organization of students might be yet another way of breaking down what appears to be (at least at the University of Toronto) a growing system of tacit acceptance by the various elites in the educational sphere of the status quo. These elites include those of the students (student councils), administrations, and faculty, and provincial government education departments. (In Ontario that means Minister of Colleges and Universities Jack

WINDSOR

During student union history, students were hit with a lot of McNie and his civil servants.) It will take more than one or two reformist student councils to challenge the existing status quo of this bureaucratic "alliance" system. Perhaps the provincial and even better still a supra-provincial organization can formulate strategy to challenge the real decision-making centres of education — in the provincial ministries of education. The administration at U of T, for example, is merely the buffer zone between students and a seemingly competent provincial government attempting to perpetuate a guise of stable, well-administered government.

The very existence of a national organization means that students can act in concert on a national scale with permanent in. At the present time every time a union wants to do something nationally it must contact all the other student unions on its own, plan the effort, and do what they can, with the money they have to perform the role of a national organization. When their interest fails, or their job is done, no one else knows how they did it, the files are usually lost within a few years and the rest of Canadian students learn or gain nothing for the future. This problem could be partially if not totally resolved by a national student organization.

Another positive attribute of a national student union is the value of an informational network. A national union is the only sure way of getting all student unions to let each other know what they are doing; and each can then learn from the mistakes, successes and methods of others. If will be able to see how all out their course evaluation finance and distribute the decisions on hiring, firing are made. Every union years of experience almost the union is any good it will on to its members.

The idea of a National was first conceived by Windsor Student Council at a national meeting to discuss national union. At the Windsor May, 1972, after a week of associations present (and were represented) decided need for a new union and member steering committee future meetings.

The conference proved only a partial success. At the need for a national union the errors of CUS, especially procedures that would bring into reality and brought leaders from more than 100 ed to include students from speaking institutions of university post-secondary.

The steering committee began to co-ordinate and found a new national union same time it drafted a Things ain't the way they used to be. In the good old days we had Kent State (above), now just fun, fun, fun.

Student unionism's resplendent past

For approximately 43 years, from 1926 to 1969, various national student organizations comprised largely of university students, existed in Canada. The longest organization was the National Federation of Canadian University Students (NFCUS) which existed until 1964 (except for a short suspension during World War II) as a service organization for university students, as represented by their campus student council organizations.

NFCUS proved to be a product of its environment, for although the organization did much to promote student unionism during the more than three decades of its existence, its objectives were status quo-oriented, treating the student as a good liberal citizen — that is, a reflection of his society. NFCUS' position within Canadian politics (as a voluntary organization of sorts) was exemplified by its objectives: the promotion of a better understanding among Canadian students, a higher degree of co-operation among all student organizations, the advancement of legitimate student interests, and the development of relationships with other national and international groups. High ideals indeed, but a mainly service-oriented organization.

The NFCUS program had several drawbacks, but it reflected the pre-1960's political mood. Whereas the 1970's (or at least this part of the decade) appear to be a period of political retrenchment — or as one friend has put it "sandbagging against the forces of reaction on the one hand and attempting to make some progress on the other" — the mid to late 60's saw definite extra-parliamentary political involvement. The universities also provided "fertile ground for social ferment" and NFCUS failed to face the meaning and reality of the student's position in Canadian universities and other post-secondary institutions. For one, it narrowly defined people who attended a university as "students" and failed to perceive them as citizens also, who interrelated with a much broader "societal" community than that associated with the old "ivory tower" concept.

A second point was that, although NFCUS claimed one of its purposes was to "advance the legitimate student interests," the Federation narrowly defined those interests along the lines of service-oriented programs — for example, charter flights, international student flights, and link ups with several international organizations such as AIESEC, to provide students with summer jobs on an exchange basis overseas.

The October 1963 Congress marked the beginning of a restructuring of the national organization, with Quebec students being allowed an equal voice in all matters concerning them. (The name of the organization was also changed to the Canadian Union of Students) But only one year after, Quebecois delegates took their unions out of CUS and later founded their own organization, Union Generale des Etudiants de Quebec (UGEQ). Both UGEQ and CUS immediately attempted to go beyond the narrow self-imposed limitations of NFCUS and began to become involved with student problems on a political level.

CUS and UGEQ examined questions affecting the day-to-day existence of students, such as housing, unemployment, student loans, and student visas. The organizations also took a more radical political tone than that of their predecessors, examining accessibility to the university, university power structures, and the role the university plays in the world of government and big business.

The question of universal accessibility lead the member organizations to see the problem as "the abolition of all social and financial barriers to post-secondary education." But the organizations (and their member politicians) became increasingly politicized when, examining the question of universal accessibility, they began to realize that they had to consider all aspects of education and society, "for it is impossible to change the university substantially without changing society."

At the same time as CUS was becoming more political, it continued to provide essential services, distributing publications on topics such as co-ops, education, housing, and incorporation of student organizations. The national union also operated research services which developed positions on student representation and participation in university government. In addition, CUS sponsored a life insurance plan, operated a travel service (now taken over by the Association of Student Councils — AOSC), and performed lobbying functions in Ottawa. CUS helped to create, for example, the Canada Student Loan Plan, and lobbied for legislation allowing students to deduct the academic portion of their tuition fees from their taxable income.

However, CUS became increasingly political in tone and rhetoric and the "social service" aspect of the national organization began to fade from view. (Although this part of CUS' program still existed, it was pushed to the background by the increasingly militant language of CUS leaders.) Vanguardism became the orientation of the national organization, and by choosing this path CUS national leaders forced the exclusion of many progressive organizations and people. CUS folded primarily because it became "more progressive" than its member organization — that is by taking more militant stands, it became counter-productive. The CUS national leadership lost touch with campus leaders and the overwhelming majority of students; it was facing questions and searching for solutions that were still largely considered taboo by most university student councils.

In addition, the established or "downtown" press seized on these "more radical views" and capitalized on the controversy, helping to confuse the issues and drive a wedge between CUS, the students and the student organizations. The foregone result was that CUS folded in 1969 after most of its members voted to withdraw. The next year UGEQ went the same path, but the Quebec students formed a regional union in 1971, the Front des Etudiants du Quebec (FEQ).

and encouraged campus debate on the direction of the new union.

Early last November the NUS founding conference was held at Ottawa with 50 student associations in attendance. At the same meeting a constitution was adopted, priorities of financing education, student housing and employment were established, and the first NUS Central Committee was elected.

The Central Committee began to attempt to broaden the base of the NUS by contacting all post-secondary institutions in Canada and informing them of its existence and encouraging new members. And by May 1973, there were 24 member institutions in the NUS from seven provinces. (There are now about 30 member organizations.)

Finally, the first annual General Meeting was held in early May in Dalhousie University in Halifax, where the union began research and developed policy in several areas of direct concern to students (from housing and student aid to student representation in administrative bodies of post-secondary institutions). Several committees were struck to deal with these issues. One such committee — dealing with the financing of post-secondary education is chaired by SAC vice-president Stephen Moses.

In addition, a new central committee composed of nine people was elected and met several times during the past summer. A staffed national office was also established in Ottawa, and a budget was drawn up on the basis of a 30 cents per student fee levy.

and their response was to walk away from it.

Unknown famine hits Ethiopia

A large-scale famine, allegedly caused by lack of rain, has once again hit Ethiopia this year, and millions of people are undergoing terrible suffering. In terms of its magnitude, the present famine is one of the most disastrous ever to have hit the people of Ethiopia. It has affected over five million people—about one quarter of the total population—but little information about the famine gets outside the country.

In 1959 when more than 200,000 people died of famine very little news reached the outside world. As a result of this news blackout there was neither external help reaching the people nor world opinion to press the government to take measures to alleviate the sufferings of the people. The Ethiopian government is now following a similar course during this year's crisis.

The government has been reluctant to take precautionary measures to alleviate the famine even though the United Nations Food and Agricultural Organization warned in advance that a severe drought was about to hit the country. Worse still, the Ethiopian government, through the government-owned media has denied the existence of famine and refused to mobilize food and other necessities to the starving population.

Various reliable eye-witness reports describe the terrible nature of this famine which has already taken thousands of lives and forced millions of people to leave their homes and travel for days in search of food and water. Although accurate figures are hard to obtain, the English Newspaper "The Observer" estimates the death toll at over 50,000 people.

For the last several months there has been a large exodus of impoverished people from province to province and even to neighbouring countries like Sudan. As a result, countless villages and communities have been deserted. Families have disintegrated, some members have perished, others disappeared to unknown places. The people that are affected most are women, children, the old or those who could not manage to travel far.

In April 1973, three professors of the Haile Selassie University, sent by concerned members of the university community to assess the situation in the famine affected regions, gave a vivid eye-witness account of the sad and depressing situation that is existing there. Their report never reached the outside public and two of them were jailed temporarily.

Because of the professors' report, another group composed of professors and students was sent in May 1973 to deliver some aid to the most seriously affected areas. On their arrival in the area they were immediately arrested on the grounds of not carrying passports, although citizens of Ethiopia are not required by law to carry them within the country. Eventually they succeeded in distributing food and clothing to some of the people. The report of the professors and that of the other groups were smuggled out of the country to reach the World Wide Federation of Ethiopian Students.

Some of the common incidents mentioned in the reports were of babies dying on the backs of their mothers, of pregnant women having miscarriages, of old people collapsing in the streets and so on.

The magnitude of suffering and dehumanization of the people has surpassed the limits of imagination. A country which claims 3000 years of history has turned its people into prehistoric gatherers searching the ground for scattered seeds and grain.

How is it that this situation is taking place in a country whose agricultural potential is estimated to feed the entire population of the African continent, and who is responsible for it?

The Ethiopian government claims that nature and the drought are responsible for this particular famine as well as for all the other famines and miseries that the people have always faced in the past.

Religious and other institutions have also been effectively used to propagate the idea that famine and other miseries of the people are willed by god to punish them for their crimes, and that they should turn to praying and nothing else.

Ethiopia is a semi-feudal, semi-colonial society. The ruling class composed of landlords, the monarchy, the Ethiopian Orthodox (Coptic) Church hierarchy and a tiny capitalist class wields complete political power and owns almost the entire wealth of the country. The church alone owns 30 per cent of the total arable land while the aristocracy and the monarchy own 50-60 per cent of the remaining land.

The peasantry which constitutes about 90 per cent of the population is required by the "law" of the state to turn over 75 per cent of its produce to the landlord class which also enjoys the services of the peasantry in other ways such as fene building. With little left, the peasantry is compelled to lead a life bordering an famine situation even under "normal" circumstances.

Foreign capitalists dominate the industrial and commercial sectors with local capitalists playing a subservient role. All aspects — of life — political, economic, cultural, and military — are dominated by foreign powers.

According to the agreement which was signed in 1953 and revised in 1957, the U.S. is given an unconditional right to use Ethiopian territory for the operation and management of its military base and all the activities that go with it. According to US News and World Report, the U.S. also maintains the largest radio relay station in the world in Asmara, a city in the northern part of the country. Which relays military messages from overseas to the Pentagon from ships in the Indian Ocean and Diplomatic traffic from U.S.

It is a manifestation of this feudal and neo-colonial oppression and exploitation of the people that famine occurs in Ethiopia very frequently. This is a further proof that the question of famine is intimately linked with the particular social system of a given country.

In a society like Ethiopia where the system is based on oppression and exploitation of a peasant population, chronic famine is an unavoidable fact because the ruling class, using its political power, deprives the masses of the products of their own labour.

For the landed gentry and money lenders this is a time of hoarding and speculation when the poor peasant is uprooted from his land, and to sell his land, belongings and labour at a give-away price. For instance, the price of cattle in the famine affected areas has dropped to a mere 3-10 Ethiopian dollars as against the national average of 80 Ethiopian dollars. This is a drop of about 90 per cent. At the same time, the Israeli-owned Inco meat packing company, located in Asmara squeezes out huge profits from this human tragedy.

Thus while there is enough food in the market to feed the whole population, the profiteering of the landlords and inability of the masses to pay soaring prices for produce, they were forced to give to landowners creates a severe famine causing millions of people to starve.

The Ethiopian government and the feudal ruling class have remained adamant about the situation and have refused to give any report of the famine to the international public. The attempt to hide the fact of the famine from the rest of the world and even to the Ethiopian people living in the non-affected areas, and the government's failure to undertake relief operations have left disaster to ravage the country with unprecedented intensity.

Under these circumstances and in the absence of an organized group to voice the misery of the people (formation of any group that opposes the policy of the government is illegal) the Ethiopian students boldly took the initiative to let the world know about the severity of the famine.

Realizing the gravity of the situation, the students at Haile Selassie University have raised 70,000 Ethiopian dollars and defying all forms of resistance from the government, managed to buy and distribute grains to the people in the famine stricken regions. Moreover, member of the World Wide Federation of Ethiopian students abroad have formed "Committee to help the Famine Victims in Ethiopia." In this endeavor they have been soliciting various philanthropic organizations and individuals to donate any kind of help for the immediate need of the starving people.

NDP lecture produces contemplative hacks

By WAYNE ROBERTS

"Eve didn't eat the apple because it was advertised but because it was prohibited," said Sid Green, Manitoba's Minister of Mines and Resources at a wide-ranging lecture on coercion in labor legislation at OISE Wednesday evening.

Green was speaking at the kick-off lecture of a ten-week series sponsored by the Ontario New Democratic Party on the theme of Liberty and Equality.

Taking restrictive labor legislation as his major theme, Green elaborated his own argument, unpopular even in NDP circles, in favor of completely free collective bargaining under all situations.

He opposed compulsory arbitration or back to work legislation in the same way that he would oppose forced investment by capitalists into losing ventures or legislation restricting a company's ability to hire strikebreakers.

He illustrated his argument about the limitations of legal coercion with examples ranging from Adam and Eve to the absurdity of compulsory arbitration in marital conflicts. He pointed out that legal coercion could never substitute for individuals working together toward a solution. Comparative evidence from countries with varying degrees of coercion in labor legislation indicated, he argued, that compulsory arbitration consistently increases the number of strikes.

When both labor and management representatives are aware of and count on inevitable government intervention, their tendency to irresponsibility is intensified. They know that if an agreement is not worked out harmoniously, responsibility can be passed on to the third party. It is this attitude, Green argued, that results in the irony of compulsory arbitration leading to more rather than less industrial unrest.

A number of the audience of 50 people took exception to his "equalitarian" concept of the law in a social environment where "the dice are loaded for management." On the contrary, Green argued, in a free fight, with no legislation restricting either party to an industrial dispute, labor would come out ahead.

Just as the audience and Green were warming to the fight, the meeting was concluded by the chairman. Provincial NDP secretary Gordon Vichert, in an appeal for Party members to consider liberty on the same plane as equality in the definition of the NDP's philosophy. It is this relationship, he noted, which will continue to be examined in forthcoming lectures in the series.

The series is being sponsored by a bequest from the late Francis Eady, longtime activist and educator in the NDP and labor movement. It is an attempt to locate the party philosophically and politically in the still tense aftermath of the Waffle crisis.

The Waffle, suggested U of T history professor Des Morton, one of the initiators of the series, fed on and reflected a deep seated unease among party members as to the precise political philosophy and delineations of the NDP.

Rapid growth and membership expansion in the sixties eroded the Fabian social-democratic heritage and the traditions of the CCF. Local issues and enthusiasms developed in an "intellectual fridge" and vacuum, said Morton.

This, he felt, necessitated a reexamination of political fundamentals, defining the NDP relative to both liberal capitalism and the so-called "undemocratic left." The ten-week series is designed to explore these fundamentals in further depth.

THE UNIVERSITY IS FIRING SOME OF ITS BEST TEACHERS

It's happening because decisions about who gets tenure — or who doesn't get tenure — are made secretly by small groups of senior faculty members.

Tenure means virtually a lifetime appointment in the university. But most young professors denied tenure are then automatically excluded from teaching anymore here.

Tenure and other staffing decisions — hiring, promotion, salary — ARE RARELY BASED ON PROFESSORS' TEACHING ABILITIES. They are usually based on research performance, the number of publications faculty members produce, and their willingness to perform administrative functions.

Teachers are often denied tenure, and then released, purely because of personality conflicts with "senior colleagues". And the majority of faculty members and administrators want to keep the system running that way.

As a result many of the people that undergraduates have conducting their lectures and tutorials are abysmal teachers.

The best judges of professors' teaching abilities are their students. The only real way to ensure that teaching ability is taken seriously in staffing decisions is to ensure that student interests are guaranteed. AND THIS MEANS SITTING STUDENTS IN EQUAL NUMBERS WITH FACULTY MEMBERS ON THE BODIES MAKING THOSE DECISIONS.

Only then can students be assured that their interest in good teaching is given equal prominence with the faculty's desire to see sound research continue.

On Oct. 17 and 18 (this Wednesday and Thursday)

U of T undergraduates will be asked,

Library workers supported

MONTREAL (CUP)—Students at Sir George Williams University are rallying to support striking library workers.

The library workers went on strike September 25 after seven months of futile negotiations with the university administration. The main disagreement is over salary levels. The union and the administration are still about $1000 apart on annual salaries for the majority of the workers.

The Students' Strike Support Committee has collected 3,000 signatures on a petition calling for the administration to meet the union's demands for a living wage and decent working conditions.

At a meeting organized by the Sir George Williams Student Council, John Hall, head of the administration's negotiating committee, claimed the university did not have the money to meet the strikers' salary demands.

Provincial government grants to universities are given on the basis of enrolment, with increases of seven per cent for salaries and three per cent for all other items, Hall said.

"With lower enrolments during the last two years and rapidly increasing costs, our financial base eroded." At that point, one member of the audience disagreed with Hall's excuse. "From 1971 to 1972, the costs of the administration increased by $206,000, but library expenses have only gone up by $135,000. It seems there is a correlation between government grants and salaries only when they favour the administration," he contended.

One of the organizers of the meeting, arts student president Alan Dever, believes students find it difficult to understand the dispute or to support the strike. "A lot of people have asked me why they should support the strikers when they're the people who've closed down the library," he said.

Dever said students must realize "it's not the workers but the administrators who have closed the library by the fact that they've refused to negotiate seriously with the union."

A number of faculty and student associations have passed motions concerning the strike but most have been of the "Motherhood and Apple Pie" sort, asking the administration to propose a new position significantly different from their former position so that negotiations could be re-opened.

Students in one history class passed a motion saying they "absolutely support" the workers' demands, condemn the administration's negotiating policy, and support "future requests of the library union regarding boycotts and class cancellations."

The Sir George Student Council has not taken a position in the dispute.

The last Sir George library strike, two years ago, was settled quickly because of pressure from the university community. When that strike was three weeks old, Sir George professors held a meeting to discuss whether to strike in sympathy. Although they decided not to strike, the threat of widespread cancellation of classes forced a resumption of negotiations and a settlement.

Nader's no threat now

Ralph Nader is no longer a threat to American big business.

In fact the highest institutional authority of US capitalism now pictures Nader more as an efficiency consultant to Wall Street and Madison Avenue than as a radical advocate of consumers' rights.

Edward Rust, president of the US Chamber of Commerce told businessmen attending a recent Chicago conference that it is only when products do not live up to their advertising and to buyers' expectations that Nader seeks to have them regulated by the government. "That suggests a considerable degree of faith in the system and contrasts sharply with the revolutionary who would tear it down," he explained.

Rush, who is also president of the six companies in the State Farm Insurance group, assured the conference that he was not siding with Nader against business because Nader "is not on the other side."

He believed that it was "inevitable that sooner or later someone like Nader would arise to focus and articulate the dissatisfactions and frustrations that are widespread among American consumers." "However, when business sees consumerism and its spokesmen as its enemies then business is demonstrating its own failure to understand the healthy tensions and competing pressures that must always be present that system if it is to survive."

The Wall Street Journal agreed that "Nader has proven himself an excellent diagnostician of the ills of the marketplace and American businessmen would do well to listen to him."

After Nader began his crusade against GM in 1966, private detectives, hired by GM, investigated his monastic life, but were unable to uncover anything they could use in order to discredit him.

A week before Rust's speech, Nader spoke at the UN, attacking the multinational corporations. He suggested that host countries could insist, as a condition of entry, that a multinational firm provide a plan to turn over some percentage of ownership to the state or some private group within a certain period of time.

Mustangs finish Blues' title hopes

By PAUL CARSON

It's going to be a short season for the football Blues following Saturday's humiliating 44-10 loss to Western Mustangs amid the rain and mud of London's J. W. Little Stadium. With a record of 3-3 and only two games remaining to play, only the most improbable set of circumstances can prolong the Varsity season following the next two Saturday afternoons against Queens and Ottawa.

In a game they simply had to win Blues could never muster the offensive drive or defensive effort to produce the big play in critical situations while Western continually managed to execute the important plays whenever needed.

Varsity chose to take a gusting wind at their backs to open the game but the strategy immediately backfired as Mustangs ran the opening kickoff back to their own thirty-five and then marched the entire length of the field in eight running plays and but one pass to grab a 7-0 lead within the first five minutes. Halfback Herman Carter, a former semi-pro player with Bramalea Satellites, set the tone for the afternoon's miseries by romping 32 yards on the first scrimmage play on what initially appeared to be a harmless sweep around right end.

Carter's run, a successful third down gamble by Mustang quarterback Joe Fabiani, and the eventual opening touchdown by halfback Bud Wilson typified what soon became a game of total futility for Varsity players, coaches, and the few supporters who braved the wind and steady rain throughout the afternoon.

Blues managed a slight comeback with a modest drive that produced Donny Thomson's 46 yard single off a wide field goal attempt and midway through the quarter Western wisely conceded a safety touch. That made the score 7-3 but Blues were never to be close again.

Bill Hogan raced 55 yards on an end reverse as the Varsity defensive unit forgot the basic elements of pursuit and solid tackling. This drive ended in a 31 yard field goal but the proverbial seeds of destruction had been planted. The larger Western line pushed Blues around with ease and the Varsity secondary was guilty of atrocious tackling on many critical situations.

Offensively, Blues gambled and failed with their running attack as the endless pelting rain effectively nullified the aerial game without which this year's team cannot win. The much-maligned Varsity punt returners also contributed their usual share of fumbles and sloppy fielding.

Blues fell apart completely in the second quarter when Western was operating with the benefit of the wind. The grateful Mustangs made the most of their opportunities to record two more field goals plus touchdowns on a Fabiani pass to Ed Petrie and a short run by Carter.

To their credit Blues continued to play with spirit and determination, if not overly much skill, but their desire produced only further disappointment. Varsity took the wind again to open the third quarter but the results were as painful as before. Mustangs needed only six plays to make the score 37-3 as Carter raced 63 yards behind solid blocking for his second touchdown of the game.

Western scoring ended a few minutes later when substitute halfback Rob Hartwell ran 49 yards for Mustangs' fifth touchdown as non-existent tackling made the score possible.

Blues' offence was virtually invisible during the entire quarter as the only Varsity first down of the entire fifteen minutes came on the final play off two good runs by rookie Bob Hedges.

Hedges' running provided some inspiration as the drive continued into the final quarter and eventually reliable Cor Doret scored Varsity's only touchdown on a one-yard run. The remainder of the game saw the Blues' defensive unit play up to its potential against the Western subs while the offense simply floundered in exasperation.

Blues will have two opportunities to recover their lost pride and in the process determine the eventual eastern division champion in the two home games against Queens and Ottawa.

Golf team places 5th

The golf team came up with a fine effort at Western on the weekend but could only manage a fifth place finish in a strong, closely-packed field. Defending champs McMaster repeated as winners with Queen's only two strokes behind them.

Low scorer for Toronto was John Bayes with 73-77 for a 150 total. Ian Giles scored 144 on 71-73 to take the individual honors. The other Blues team members were: Doug Findlay, 78-79; Jim Atkinson, 76-79; Tony Sergautis, 81-75; Scott Laird, 74-77.

The final standings found the eight finalists jammed into a 19 stroke span: McMaster, 600; Queen's, 602; Guelph, 606; Western, 608; Toronto, 609; York, 614; Windsor, 615; Carleton, 619.

Victoria leads lacrosse

By Chris Robinson

The battle for the Dr. W. A. Dafe trophy in interfaculty lacrosse has been a two-way fight between PHE A, and Erindale in recent years. The jocks are defending champs but it looks this year as if a new star has risen.

Vic sneaked by PHE 5-4 in the season opener on three by the paladin Orlando and a pair by Butler. PHE replied with goals from McGuey, McNeil, Brown, and a try from Sorbie (converted). The same Victorians marked four and three respectively in putting down Engineering (Kurczyk 3, Audichuk 2, Woodczuk assisting) 7-5. They spread the scoring around a little in wallopping St. Mikes 10-3 with Butler and Young each tallying four, another Young and Ralph singles. For the micks, Gilksnson and Beltrand counted.

Meanwhile, PHE was wiping the rest of the league. Brown (8), McNeil (2), Yonkeura and McGuey counted for a 12-5 smash of Devonshire (Anderson 3, Manougian 2). They then humbled Erindale 9-2 with Brown (5), Numeroski (2), McNeil and Yonkeura doing the honors against Geraghty and Steril.

Erindale seems to have fallen far from last year's team, since in another encounter they bowed 6-3 to St. Mikes. For the winners it was Curpi with three, Gilkinson two and Higgins against Tailion's hat-trick. The only green win was against the hapless Devonshires, a close 6-4 decision on scores by Tailion (3), Geraghty, Wiley, and Sutherland, against Paramaksezan, Anderson, Huckstep and Gay.

In other first division action SMC (Gilkinson 3, Feerick) took Eng (Audichuk 2), 4-2. The plumbers (Kurczyk 3, Cruickshank 2) won their first from Dev (Anderson, Paramaksezan, Huckstep, Flugel) 5-4.

As of this report, the second division had seen little action because of forfeits. PHE B defaulted to Knox because of football exhaustion, New to PHE C, and Eng II to UC. The only game played saw Trinity (Possum 2, Storey, Miller) pull off a last minute 4-4 tie with Forestry (Mann 2, Campbell, Hosick).

The classes had their beginnings two years ago, when the instructor, Mr. Burt Konzak, first offered training in self-defense and beginners' karate. Since then, growing interest has led to an increase in the number of beginners' classes, and also to the introduction of several advanced classes per week.

The success of the program, and of the women in it, seems to rest partly on the emphasis on the whole person. As Mr. Konzak expresses it, karate-do involves mental discipline as much as physical technique. In his classes there is a tangible atmosphere of concentration and respect, as visitors often note.

The respect that exists between students is part of an attitude which emphasizes the progress of the whole class rather than of a few talented individuals. Many advanced students attend the beginners' classes, both to strengthen their knowledge of the basics and to help the new students in their learning.

The learning consists of basic techniques (for speed and form), sparring (in which points are called but actual contact is not legal), and kata (standard series of techniques, often abstract—like ballet, but with power). Proficiency in all aspects as well as good attitude is necessary for advancement.

Gaels lick Varsity in rugby

By James MacDonald

On Saturday morning the two Blues' rugby teams travelled to Queen's in Kingston to play two important games. Unfortunately, neither team played well and Toronto returned with two defeats.

The first XV started their game at 12:30, which hardly gave them the chance to wake up after the three hour bus ride and this showed as Queen's proceeded to win almost every loose ruck and also demonstrated good work in the backs. Pressure was applied immediately to the Blues' defence but three penalty kicks in a row were missed by Queen's and Toronto was left unscathed. Still unable to rally the Blues were quickly pushed back on the few attempts to move downfield and it was not long before a breakdown in the Toronto centres gave Gaels an overlap which they readily took advantage of as they swept in for a try. The convert was good and Queen's was ahead 6-0. Still Toronto showed no ability to comeback and it was only a few minutes later when Queens again broke open the Toronto defence for another score and went in front 12-0. The half ended with no more scoring as the Blues played a purely defensive game.

The second half started with a complete turn around as the Toronto pack drove into the first ruck hard and won the ball. This trend continued and the Blues showed their first serious attempts at scoring. It was only a few minutes into the half when Dave Amborski made good a 25 yard penalty kick for 3 points. Relentlessly the Toronto team pressed on and Amborski picked up another three points on a 20 yard penalty goal. Play began to see-saw for a while but the Blues showed superior attack and fifteen minutes into the half Amborski picked up yet another penalty goal from 30 yards. The Toronto team was closing in as they were only three behind, 12-9. However, the Blues started to lapse and Queen's fought back with some good kicking. With 12 minutes to go a wild pass near their goal-line cost the Blues 6 points as Queens went ahead 18-9. Toronto was not about to give up and a renewed attack finally netted them a try as centre Rodger Wright broke through several tackles and went in for the try. On one of the strangest plays of the afternoon Amborski was refused permission to replace the ball after the wind blew it over when he was trying for the convert. After a slight hesitation Amborski went and kicked the ball which miraculously went through the posts for the two points.

With only a few minutes of injury time left the Blues were denied any more chances at scoring and Queens were left with a 18-15 victory. This leaves the Blues still in the running but now they must depend on some one else beating York as well as winning their two league games left at home: Queens on the 27th and York on the 31st.

The second team were completely out-hustled, out-hit, and beaten by a vastly superior team as they went down to defeat, 26-0. Although the Blues demonstrated the superiority which they do have for the first five minutes they proceeded to give up the game as they refused to run for the ball, to pick up the ball and run with it and to tackle. The first half was a see-saw battle as the Blues were assisted by a strong tail wind and the large number of scrums which they won throughout the game. Queen's managed to pick up 4 points in the last minute on a rather dubious side-line run. The second half was a rout as Toronto showed no desire and the opposition became more and more fired up with each score. The Blues are going to have to get used to hitting harder if they want to win the division. Queens has also lost a game as RMC put them down, 4-0. If the Blues win in their two games left against Queen's and York they can clinch the cup. But it is going to take a lot of work and hitting.

This week Toronto's second XV has two exhibition games, on Monday against Trinity at 5:15 and on Thursday at 7:30 in Varsity Stadium against Trent's first XV, a game which will be followed by the first XV playing the Old Blues.

No stall on discipline code

By RANDY ROBERTSON

SAC president Bob Anderson charged yesterday at a meeting of the Governing Council's Academic Affairs committee that the Haist rules and the procedures proposed for the university discipline code are in conflict — to the benefit of faculty.

Anderson attempted unsuccessfully to have the committee table the proposed discipline structures and procedures until the task force on Academic Appointments chaired by vice-president and provost Don Forster, considers modifying the procedures for granting tenure, (the Haist rules,) in relation to the disciplinary code.

A teacher charged with gross misconduct sufficient to lead to dismissal may be tried by the appropriate university tribunal, but if he was tenure he may demand to be under the Haist rules.

The result at the least is a duplication of the actions of the tribunal — very time consuming and very expensive since under the Haist rules the accused has the right to counsel.

At the worst the decision of the Haist tribunal may be direct opposite of the decision of the university tribunal.

Anderson said that the new discipline code had been represented as applying equally to faculty and students. "Now we find it is to apply only to students and untenured faculty."

Anderson charged that a committee set up to deal with an act of "gross misconduct" under the Haist rules is in effect an attempt at mediation. It does not provide a proper judicial hearing.

Haist committees deal with matters of competence, and see things from that point of view, Anderson said. Academic Affairs chairman J.E. Dove stressed the contractual significance of the Haist rules.

"The Haist rules," he said, "are part of the conditions under which a faculty member works for the university."

Any changes in the Haist rules must be negotiated by the university with the faculty, Dove said.

Dove urged that the problems raised by the Haist rules should not be resolved in relation to discipline but in relation to Forster's committee on hiring and firing.

That committee, which has just released its report, recommended reforms in the Haist rules, but left their basic procedures much the same.

Anderson claimed that he had asked the Internal Affairs committee last spring to alert the presidential task force to the conflicts between the Haist rules and the proposed discipline code.

Forster asked committee member J.D. Dunlop, who was on the Forsters task force whether he had ever seen such a letter. Dunlop said he did not remember.

Anderson said he had asked that the letter be directed to Forster. Forster said that he did not remember receiving such a letter.

Dove and university vice-president Jill Conway both claimed that the significance of the Haist rules had been fully debated in the spring by the Academic and Internal Affairs committee meetings and in joint meetings of the task forces on discipline and academic appointments.

Anderson, noting that the Forster task force recommends that the university be able to fire tenured professors for redundancy in addition to incompetence, claimed that if grounds for dismissal in the Haist rules could be changed then the procedure could be too.

Dove claimed that the provision of redundancy as a specific ground for dismissal is in effect dismissal for incompetence, claimed that if grounds for the professor to do in relation to his competence.

He claimed that there was no analogy between this proposal of the task force and Anderson's proposal.

Dove suggested that the conflict between the rules and the tribunal, be avoided by the giving the dean of a faculty the option to recommend to the university's president that dismissal procedures be instituted under the Haist rules.

Forster said that the apparent conflict between the rules and the code should be discussed in relation to the proposals of the task force on academic appointments, chaired by Forster.

Tenure depends heavily on research: Ivey

By TIM GALLAGHER

New College principal Don Ivey said Monday night that tenure decisions frequently depend heavily on a professor's research and publications, because "we don't know what constitutes good teaching."

The comment came during a debate between Ivey and SAC president Bob Anderson, on student participation in tenure decisions.

Ivey went on to say: "The university is an elitist institution. By nature, I believe it has to be."

Anderson stressed that "students must defend their interests by sitting on committees." There are professors who can teach "very well" and "other people who have the potential to teach well" but are "unprepared in lectures or unavailable outside of class," he said. The main reason

Anderson went further and claimed that "faculty don't really care about teaching although they claim to do so." Students should appear on committees to "make sure teaching is considered" and that evaluations are carried out. He said there are instances where tenure committees did "not include the information on evaluations." Also he believed that students on the committee could "better understand the feelings of students doing the evaluations."

Anderson mentioned that at Erindale there are a "great many denials of tenure" but a large number of faculty from the St. George Campus are sent to Erindale. Therefore, he was under the impression that profs at Erindale were being let go to make room for the overflow from St. George.

Ivey began by stating he represen-but admitted there "may be poor teachers." At this interval he posed the question of "what constitutes good teaching?"

Ivey didn't think that students were the "best judges at the time they are taking the course." To get a true evaluation Ivey contended that students should make assessments even after graduation. Anderson disagreed saying "those (faculty) who are abysmal remain so."

Ivey's doubts, however, were more concerned with the evaluations themselves. He said: "The trouble with course evaluations is that students are too kind to their professors." In addition, Ivey considered evaluations as not sufficient nor adequate, but said: "I agree on the necessity of getting more teaching data."

As for the emphasis on certain criteria, he asserted that the number of papers a professor produces is not the main factor. But a committee feels "more comfortable in this area because we don't know what constitutes good teaching."

Certain qualities, he related, were essential for membership on a tenure committee. Intelligence and perspective were the main ones. "The staff are more intelligent," he claimed, and as for perspective. "The staff have a better one." Simply, he elaborated, the university is comprised of an "intellectual elite."

Before either participant spoke, Matthews, chairman of the debate, outlined the basics of tenure.

Matthews said tenure was essentially a means of job security and a guarantee of academic freedom. Selection for tenure, he pointed out, is based on three criteria: teaching ability, scholastic achievement, and administrative duties.

The mechanism for the granting of tenure, he said, was a committee which included the dean of the faculty. Four of the seven members are professionals or non-administrative personnel.

He mentioned a person could be removed from a tenured position for "gross misconduct" under the Haist rules.

In summation, Anderson and Ivey voiced opposite proposals. Anderson believed students could distinguish between "teachers and performers" and that student representation would "balance the interests" on the tenure committees.

Ivey was more pessimistic. He acknowledged some students could function in a committee environment but through experience has found that students are "too quick to make decisions based on too little evidence;" faculty are less apt to "jump to conclusions." He finished by saying: "I simply don't accept the fact that an individual or a group of students will improve things on the departments. Also she said only in the Philosophy and Sociology departments is teaching given any consideration, in tenure decisions.

Another issue "debated" was the question of whether the men's and women's sports directorates would be combined into a single body and whether students would have parity. Ivey asserted he had no strong feelings on the issue. In fact, he thinks the referendum will favor the proposal to combine directorates.

Anderson's major complaint was

for this he felt was that "research is attracting too much time of the faculty."

He then noted that the Council of Ministers of Education, drawn from all the provinces of Canada, reported that research detracts from teaching ability" and that "teaching is not given enough emphasis in university."

ted his own beliefs. He didn't think there was a unified faculty opinion.

He felt the fact there were no dismissals under the Haist rule could mean that the present committee structure has "done a good job". He maintained: "I do not know of any staff members who don't take their teaching responsibilities seriously" committee".

New College principal Don Ivey.

Several members of the audience mentioned other issues. Howard Levitt, a student member of the Governing Council, revealed that little had been said of the most important issue—student parity. He felt that student representation was very crucial to counter the "political and social persuasions of the people on the tenure committee." Moreover, he noted there was not even one Marxist in the Economics department. Student voice "would be significant in fighting the dominance of racist and anti-working class ideas in many university departments," Levitt said.

Susan Goldberg, New College SAC rep said that "some faculty are afraid to speak" and spoke of a "reign of terror" in some that "big money sports" dominate the sports facilities at U of T. For instance, he said, "prime time of the Hart House pool is given to the swim team," and this is unlike other universities.

A member of the audience protested that although the university is earning $150,000 or so from the use of Varsity Arena by the Toros on Sundays, this would interfere with the "free skating" periods formerly held at that time.

Anderson and Ivey teamed up to attack one of U of T's most sacred institutions — The Varsity. Ivey declared that "The Varsity is a totally biased view of the situation through its editorial board." Anderson chimed in to say "I would be the last person to defend the editorial policy of The Varsity or its reporting."

Tenure is outdated but still denied

By JACK GEMMELL

While "tenure is outdated" according to Erindale's Dean E.A. Robinson, tenure has been denied to Erindale professors by their downtown departments.

At least two popular professors at Erindale, Gary Thaler and Wge Meyer-Erlach, have been denied tenure this year.

Professor Meyer-Erlach had started the German department at Erindale and helped establish the German Academic club which operates a successful student exchange program.

Thaler is a popular Botany professor rated high in teaching ability by students.

Explaining such decisions Dean Robinson said that "some professors at Erindale became involved too much in teaching and university service," neglecting their research.

Such professors were "running away from reality," because while at Erindale "great stress is placed on teaching and university service" the tenure committees also require "competence in research," Robinson said.

He added that he had urged several professors to devote less time to teaching and other activities and more to research in order to meet this requirement.

Meyer-Erlach has devoted much of the seven years he has spent at Erindale in building the German department from being the smallest of the modern foreign language departments to the largest with about 180 students this year.

"I regard students as the raison d'être of professors," Meyer-Erlach said.

Out of 40 students in one of his classes last year 30 rated Meyer-Erlach excellent, eight good, and only two average, according to student course evaluation.

He is the only professor who has been in the German department at Erindale continuously since the college was founded in 1966. For the last two years he has been the only full time faculty member there.

This workload did not give him time "to polish his research," he said.

In addition Meyer-Erlach is still "an active member" in the German Academic Club, showing "a lively interest" in its programs according to Bert de Rijk, the president of the club.

The German Academic Club runs a wide range of academic and social activities including a popular social affair at Erindale.

Thaler has refused to comment because his case is up for appeal.

Look out for bulky overcoats

By PAUL McGRATH

If you make a habit of skulking, lounging or otherwise loitering around New College at odd hours with no reason, prepare for a tap on the shoulder and a possible bum's rush from campus police.

New College principal Don Ivey is "damn mad." Some person or persons has been making off with rather large pieces of college property, and in fact has extremely industrious in this pursuit since school started this fall.

A partial list of objects stolen from New College property since September includes three rather large paintings, a four foot by two brass rubbing and a six-foot high electric fan. Chairs and lamps are also on the missing list.

Ivey has circulated a letter to all New College members informing them of the rather bulky thefts, as he feels that the thefts are avoidable with a little vigilance on the part of "New" people.

"It is difficult to believe that bulky items such as those listed could be removed from the buildings without some members of the college being aware of the removal," he said in the letter.

It appears that city police have not been called in on the case — Ivey prefers to keep the investigation within the university. To help with this, he has asked all members of the college to keep their eyes open for signs of property-related disobedience and skulking people. Ivey expressed his desire to lead the brigade:

"The current rash of thefts and other anti-social acts makes me wish that I could personally patrol the college twenty-four hours a day, but this is not feasible."

He has asked the members to accept some of the responsibility for security at New College by challenging anyone seen leaving a building with college property to call the porter or police.

"The social climate and the physical surroundings of the college are my responsibility- and yours."

Cops confer at OISE conference

By LAWRENCE CLARKE

A beffy, squinty-eyed collection of private-eyes, security company executives and top-ranking police officials gathered at a secret conference at OISE yesterday.

A two day meeting convened by the University's Centre of Criminology brought together some of Canada's leading figures in both public and private security to discuss the relationship between the two. This meeting was closed to the public and after yesterday morning's opening session, it was closed to the press.

The list of the participants reads like a who's who in the super-snoop business, including: Commissioner M.F. Lindsay (R.C.M.P.), Hon. Howard Pawley (Attorney-General, Manitoba), J.B. Harman (president S.I.S. Protection), R.E. Anning (president Wackenhut), E.D. Bell (Chairman, Ont. Police Commission), and R. Hill (Vice-president International Intelligence).

The Director of the Institute of Criminology, J. Edwards, noted in his introductory remarks the burgeoning growth of the security industry (10% a year) which now makes it three times as large as public police forces. He also discussed the lack of controls over the industry because of outdated regulations.

Speaking on the control and regulation of the industry, a member of the Ontario Solicitor General's office, John Ritchie, outlined the new amendments to the Private Investigation and Security Guards Act. These mostly concerned legal house-keeping chores such as new regulations and licensing requirements.

Law professor Alan Mewett complained that the public police could be hurt by private agencies' behaviour because the public links their images together. He criticised the industry's lack of controls, insufficient employee training, and lack of business ethics. Mewett concluded that "the industry should come under public scrutiny — and not complain about it."

Discussing the relations between the police and the private agencies, a former police official Joseph Thurston declared that "the police work for people while the private agencies work for money. I don't think anyone in here would complain about that."

Thurston worried that while police were accountable to the public for their behaviour, especially when it involved force, this was not true of the private agencies. He wanted regulations to spell out their use of weaponry, electronic equipment, and chemical deterrents, such as mace which they can still use. Thurston also advocated the use of public police in Rochdale. "After all," he said, "it's no different than policing Maple Leaf Gardens."

The last speaker, Ontario Police Commissioner Fred E. Davis had little to say worth reporting, except that "police controls stop about where they run out of power. After that, there's a vacuum."

During the question period which followed, law student Mary Cornish argued that the new amendments were still unfair because there was no consultation with the public, the unions, or even the security guards themselves.

Immediately a delegate sprang ferociously to his feet, refusing to identify himself "because the press is here." (His identity, Colin Venning, Chairman of the Commercial Security Agency — was supplied by the publicity blurbs which were in abundance.)

Venning was last seen stalking out to lunch, muttering: "Sexual intellectuals. Sexual intellectuals! I'd say more if the press weren't here."

An elderly man who tried to speak of organizing the security guards was met with a stony silence.

After the morning session, the conference broke into small groups to talk shop. The conference winds up its intrigues today.

These are U of T flowers on U of T property and the higher the Hydro block rises that is making so much money for Smiling Bill's friend Gerhard Moog, the more they will wilt as their sunlight is cut off. Just another one of those "little details" that the Botany Dept. wasn't told about.

Referendum asks majority in athletic decisions

There appears to be some disagreement on this campus about the athletics question asked in today's (and tomorrow's) SAC referendum. The question asks: "Do you support the establishment of a student majority on a unified directorate governing men's and women's athletics at the University of Toronto?"

In opposition to the question two women from the Benson Building are circulating memos denouncing the referendum question and asking women not to vote. One of the women involved is Pat Dartford, a former athletic student big-wig and right-hand woman of Women's Athletic Directorate head Anne Hewett. Dartford has refused to sign the plea she is circulating preferring to call herself "a concerned student". We wish Dartford had the intestinal fortitude to sign her own name and because she didn't we thought we let you in on some of the background information.

Approximately two weeks ago Dartford phoned our offices to complain about the editorial we had run supporting the SAC referendum question on athletics. Over the phone she expressed the paranoia so common to some women we have met over the past at the Benson Building — that of letting men into the building. Without a clear understanding of what was at stake she instead chose to tell us that she would do "everything in my power to stop the women from voting" in the referendum.

And we wonder what that smooth operator Anne Hewett has to say in the matter? After all it was Pat Dartford that sat on the 1972 now-aborted users' committee on the proposals for a new athletic building along with Hewett. And it was Pat Dartford whom Hewett used over her past years at the Benson Building to legitimize her measures with the students and women athletes (e.g. her refusal to all ow a women's track team). Now Dartford has moved on to the Faculty of Education at this university, but apparently her ghost lives on.

It's no secret that Anne Hewett would prefer to keep the entire women's organization separate from the men's. It's consistent with her philosophy as expressed to us last year that the women have a different philosophy of athletics. And they do — it's Hewett's. (After all, students learn from their teachers don't they?) Dartford's paranoia is ill-founded. The Students' Administrative Council has no intention of forcing a male-dominated athletic directorate on anyone. What they would like to see is something along the lines of what we have reproduced elsewhere on this page. As you can see, what the structure calls for is a revised directorate with a student majority based on a parallel structure model. The men will run their program and the women in turn theirs. But they will meet at the top of the structure once and awhile to discuss shared use of facilities.

Which brings us to another point. Shared use of facilities shouldn't trouble the women either. A recent task force report prepared by the administration indicates that the Benson Building is in fact underused many hours of each week. Hewett signed the report, with no dissenting comments so she must also agree with that statement of fact. The Benson women that have been concerned enough to speak to their SAC reps or who have come over to talk with us have indicated a certain phobia that once the men get into "their" building that's the end of it for them. Not true. The sensible position would be to allow the men to use the building on a scheduled basis when the women don't need it; and that's probably what the administration plans. We don't really know since they won't tell us.

But the men-women bickering has to stop. Women use the indoor track and squash courts in Hart House, so why won't they let the men use the Benson when there's free time. If men and women begin fighting on this campus that's just playing into the administration's hands. While the pettiness goes on the Simcoe Hall bureaucrats will railroad us again as they have done so often in the past. So men and women on this campus let's get together for once; who knows, we might even like each other.

Riel's a pretty play, but has too many in-jokes

By TOM WALKOM

Riel, an original play showing at the University College Playhouse, is a well-crafted piece of theatrical sculpture, but one that somehow doesn't come together.

It's a series of five — well, not exactly scenes, maybe actions would be a better word — tied into the life and death of Canada's 19th century Metis rebel, Louis Riel.

Plays dealing with Canadian history have two advantages these days. Not only do Canadian audiences seem more eager to understand how their past relates to their present, but the actors can present a series of images with which the audience is already somewhat familiar — everyone knows the story of Louis Riel.

Working from this common fund, director Stephen Martineau has constructed a set of elaborate ritual movements that bounce off the Riel theme from various vantage points. One action looks at Riel from the modern classroom. "Why was Louis Riel hanged?" the teacher asks, only to be met with those familiar one-liners, ranging from, "Ask me tomorrow, teacher," to "What else can you do on a Saturday night?"

The play shifts to a chronological look at the Riel episodes, eastern settlers presenting their legal deeds to Metis prairie land, the railroad literally running over human bodies, rebellion and failure.

So far, so good. The actors move into anecdotes — interesting stories that happened to them over the summer or in high school, or somewhere. A general connection with the Riel theme — most anecdotes deal with either Canada or oppression — but the connection becomes vague, the anecdotes keep on coming, and eat up most of the hour-long production. And when the actors move into a mass dramatic reading of Riel's trial address, — it's too late. We're uneasily lost.

Not because of the acting. Aside from a few minor timing errors, the actors — all students — execute their parts with a graceful precision. And they carry the play through its weaker parts by sheer force of presentation.

But I came out of the play without a feeling of what it was about. Not that I demanded a linear explanation of the obviously ritual passages. But even ritual should have sense to it; the ritual of communion in the Christian church, for instance, has meaning because participants and observers are vaguely aware of the myths behind the symbolic images.

But what did singing Ten Green Bottles after the execution of Riel mean? Why a scenario about spring at the beginning of the play — because it was the beginning? because it was about a young country? because it was nice-looking?

I suspect the last reason. Allen Booth, one of the actors in Riel, says the play was intended to be like a composition of music. Perhaps. But Martineau, who improvised the script over rehearsals has not produced a meaningful composition. Even music, which is generally all form, when it really succeeds, contains content. The content may not be easily definable, but it can be felt. Riel was pretty most of the time, coherent some of the time, but concentrated too much on form for form's sake. Some of the actions may have meant something to Martineau and the actors. But while I'm not prepared to go as far as the audience member, who called the play "a private joke between the actors that someone forgot to tell the audience", I found enough of the scenes meaningless to leave me empty at the play's end.

By privatizing his symbols Martineau negated the common historical symbols of the Riel story — and left his audience out. And plays are kind of like newspapers — if they don't talk to an audience, what's the point? Riel is on until Saturday. It's free.

grape and lettuce boycott organized by the United Farm Workers, the struggles of women and so on. As members of society students are affected very directly by these broader social issues and NUS must provide leadership in this area as well.

In order for NUS to accurately reflect the interests of students it must be based on mass democratic discussion and decision-making.

Students at U of T are also voting on the question of equal student-faculty representation on staffing bodies such as hiring, firing, and tenure committees. Such representation can be effective if it amounts to student-faculty control over these decisions. There should be no administrative interference, i.e., representation on such committees. Student-faculty control on staffing bodies is a step towards student-faculty-staff control of the university. It is part of the process of wresting control of the university from the grip of big business and transforming it to meet the interests of the majority.

However such gains cannot simply be won through referendums. The U of T administration has shown a cold disregard for such expressions of student opinion in the past. Such control will only be won through a campaign which can draw in mass student support and participation. Ultimately on the staffing question as on all others, our determination to struggle for our rights will be the decisive factor.

response to customer complaints; in other words, the company has let its customers do the testing for them. Even if the designers were to exhibit more responsibility in this regard, I am doubtful whether they can bring their PPV to an acceptable standard of safety without at the same time further reducing efficiency and raising costs. However, the PPV idea certainly has merit, and would make an interesting problem for students in a course such as APS 401.

In conclusion, the PPV is overpriced and underdesigned in its present form, totally unacceptable for use on public thoroughfares and hardly desirable on bikeways or in parks, especially in comparison with the bicycle.

Hector won't refute racism

Last Thursday, a member of SDS telephoned U of T professor Dr. Ian Hector who we have accused of promoting the racist theory that Italians, because of their culture, are predisposed to faking injuries they receive in work accidents. In his role as a consultant to the Workmen's Compensation Board (WCB), Hector used this theory to have workers' compensation cut off. We offered to meet with him and give him the opportunity to refute these accusations.

Not only did Hector refuse such a meeting but he would not even speak to the SDS caller. He channeled his refusal through his secretary.

We are left with no alternative but to assume that his theories stand as written in his reports to the Board. We know that his and similar theories have inflicted much hardship on injured workers, forcing them and their families to live in poverty.

We feel that Hector should be removed from his position at the university for teaching racism to U of T medical students, who could in turn practice it on others. Would the medical school hire someone who persisted in teaching improper medical procedures which were hazardous to patients? Hector's racism is certainly harmful. This has been admitted by the WCB which removed him as a consultant because of his theories, in response to demands from the Committee for a Just Compensation, a group of injured workers who have been fighting the Board's practices.

The university should not provide a platform for racism. SDS is pledged to fight all these theories on campus, and we invite anyone interested to join us in having Hector removed. We, of course, remain willing to meet with Dr. Hector anytime.

Abstention would help capitalism

Mr. Rogers finds fault with my contention that free enterprise benefits all classes because I purportedly fail to recognize that benefits accruing to capitalist nations occur at the expense of less-developed countries.

Investments by foreign-owned business firms in underdeveloped nations offer a much desired source of income to natives. The poverty of India and other third world nations is due not to the failure of capitalism — which has barely been given a chance — but to the predominating factors of state-controlled economies and the refusal of natives to limit their own birth rate.

Reader points out PPV problems

Is it possible that everyone at City Hall last week considered the "People-Powered Vehicle" (PPV) as an unqualified success, as Ms. Srebrenjak implied? Certainly the Consumers' Union, in the current issue of Consumer Reports, had a different view. They in fact found the PPV, in its present form, to be quite inferior to the bicycle in price, efficiency and safety.

Firstly, the price, $459, would fetch about three fairly decent 10-speed bicycles.

As for efficiency, CU's engineers judged a comfortable cruising speed for the PPV to be much closer to 10 mph than the advertised 30 mph. This latter speed could in fact be realised only for short bursts, especially downhill, a fact that is offset by the uphill speed (as fast as you can push it). Not only the excessive weight of the vehicle but its shape, which requires pedalling from a semi-reclining position, contribute to this inefficiency. Contrast this with the simple bicycle frame, which has been described as the most efficient structure ever devised.

By far the most disturbing findings of CU came from their safety tests, of which I can only cite the most glaring examples here. Firstly, it was judged that the PPV's wide stance and low speed would force motorists to cross lane boundaries to pass it, if they could see it at all, as it has a very low profile. The presence of only three wheels is an obviously unstable design, as was borne out by CU's engineers, who could execute only the gentlest steering manoeuvres without toppling over. Finally, the brakes, which appear only on the small front wheel, lead to stopping distances much greater than for bicycles, and on hills the brakes may fail miserably.

No doubt the manufacturers of the PPV will cite the improvements that have been and are being made in their product. But CU has pointed out that the minor modifications to date have only come about in direct

War artical was "blatantly biased"

Your recent editorial disguised as article (War in the East: Back in the Tanks: Fri, Oct. 12), was a blatantly biased opinion about the situation. Fine, I admit my own blatant bias, but since we are trying to reason, it's necessary to state clearly our position and interpretation of history. Mr. Rogers' borders on the malicious toward Israel, though his credentials would mislead one into believing he had an "objective" grasp of the situation.

First I must state the basic and essential issue: Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. It has been impossible for Israel to deal with the plight of the refugee Arabs, since they have been struggling to survive as an independent state for 25 years, and since any resolve would necessitate a mutual effort by the Arab states with Israel. If the Palestinian Arabs have legitimate national aspirations so do the Jews, which is the second issue. The Jewish state should return no land to its "rightful owners" until our rightful ownership to our territory is admitted, unconditional.

"De-zionization" is an absurd solution to the problem, since what it asks for is the Jews to surrender: 1) their rightful national aspirations, and 2) their continuing national liberation (witness the Soviet Jewish escape efforts) through the resettlement of what had been conquered territory restricted to the colonial Arab population. (Fortunately, Israel does not want to drive or displace the Arab neighbours into the sea.)

The accusation of its being a "Western culture implanted in Arab Palestine" is also an error. One, since the Jewish national movement originated in 19th century Europe doesn't mean it is "Western culture implanted", because all Jews in Israel participate in its survival, derived from all lands where Jews have been oppressed (e.g. Egypt, Syria, Yemen, Iraq, Tunisia, Algeria, etc.) Two, it is no more "Western culture implanted" than are Western armaments and technology in Syria and Egypt, or the various Arab national movements.

Arab states are only "proving themselves willing" to have their people killed and our people killed to continue the historic injustice they of the East and those of the West have committed by oppressing and trying to annihilate the Jewish people and faith. They didn't merely "cross the ceasefire lines" but launched a violent and unjustifiable aggression against the Jewish people in their state. Israeli defense of its autonomy led it to counteract the 13 Arab states concerted and multiple efforts to strangle the Jews 3 times, already.

The UN will not do anything of a balanced nature since the mass of members are hostile to Israel, or apathetic to threats of attacks against the Jews (a European and American tradition). The Israeli defenders weren't "enjoying an ego-trip," with "usual contempt" for the Arabs. The Jews are aware quite clearly how they could be destroyed and annihilated by invading Arab forces exhorting a Holy War "for the Palestinians", with the rest of the world watching.

NUS can play strong role

This week students at U of T are being asked to vote on whether SAC should join the National Union of Students. Such a move should be supported.

A strong NUS can play an important role in advancing and defending our common interests. By addressing itself to the major issues facing students and by organizing campaigns, teach-ins, speaking tours, demonstrations and similar activities, NUS can reach out to the majority of students and play a leadership role in the student movement.

The issues are there: federal government cutbacks in education spending, skyrocketing inflation, record levels of youth and student unemployment, attacks on the democratic rights of students through the implementation of authoritarian "law and order" codes on several campuses, the continued denial of student-faculty control over hiring and firing, course content, etc.

While NUS must take up all campus issues which affect students it should not limit itself to this. NUS also has to support the right of self-determination for Quebec, participate in the building of an international solidarity movement to end the repression in Chile, support the

Both sides wrong in Middle East

Many people believe that all human questions are capable of solution, but there comes a time when human reason is undermined by a host of other factors which make rational answers questionable and weak. Such a condition prevails in the present struggle in the Middle East, just one more conflict in a long series of hostilities dating back to 1948.

There are those who will resurrect the prospect of an externally applied peace, those who still hold to the promise of the United Nations and peace-keeping forces. But in the face of renewed conflicts this seems a false hope to continue clinging to. The very conception of the United Nations is ill-suited to the current, and historical, context of conflict. Internationalism as a philosophy, though it flourished in the flush of a more than mildly idealistic post-war dream, has proved incapable of rendering any sort of lasting solution to acute problems throughout the world. (Even within the context of the Middle East rivalry, intervention has long been actively opposed by both parties in the question of the international status of Jerusalem.) The solution of the fundamental problem falls morally into the lap of the United Nations, as a group, because they instigated the creation of the state of Israel, which has resulted in the present chaos. Its very basis, too, was ideal; the membership being more prepared to create Edens of tranquility than to oversee the ultimate outcome of their actions.

The lack of impartialism, today, on the part of most members of the organization makes dispassionate analyses of the question improbable. The world which mourned the carnage of the war atrocities now aligns itself, to a degree, against a potentially aggressive and land-hungry Israel. The state of Israel was born in a surge of emotion, and all its difficulties may ultimately be traced back to such origins; the foundations of a nation always impose heavy consequences on its subsequent existence. One must recognize the needs of the Jewish state in protecting itself from Arab aggression. Concurrently, one cannot underestimate the disorienting effects on a nation of people, being expelled from its ancestral homeland to make way for a politically expedient new order. The Palestinian Arabs became the minions of someone else's history. One would be hard pressed to relate a similar situation anywhere or anytime in the past. The original demands of the Jewish state and religion (based on biblical history) were expressed in claims for recognition, by the transfer of present-day ownership to the authorities of the past. To the contemporary residents of Palestine these must have seemed to have been based on little more than mythological foundations. The political solution of 1948, and its failure to assume a natural position in the Middle East, are tragic examples of the shortcomings and bankruptcy of international decision-making in the administration of regional dilemmas.

The very ancient nature of the Middle East civilization, with its traditions, militates against simple liberal solutions. (The Jewish presence is a re-established, not a new, one). The main problem, which makes itself felt throughout, is one of deep-seated resolutions. The often-stated intentions of the Arab states adjoining Israel can only have awakened a sincere sense of fear and apprehension. The Jews have been forced by centuries of dire circumstances to maintain a fundamentally suspicious and cautious stance towards all others. (This has led in fact to the internal cohesiveness of the group). One cannot deny the impact of a heritage of fear and apprehension. Even the Arab peoples should sympathize with the origins of this feeling though they may not be able to accept its outcome and material effects. But both sides in the conflict have undertaken positions of unqualified antagonism; both recognize only their own rights, and reject the arguments of the other. The conflict thus assumes fundamental characteristics; a war between states where beliefs are in direct contrast, where each holds onto politically aggressive foundations. Though the Middle East confrontation cannot be held a conflict of religious beliefs, the basis of denials is inherent even in these understandings. The fact that the Jewish people hold themselves to be the esteemed chosen race of God, and that the Koran declares that there is no god but Allah, points to resoluteness in a religious sphere.

The extinction of either group in the Middle East is a ridiculous prospect, yet seen with zealousness by certain radical individuals on the opposing sides. When it comes down to it, the pressures of Zionism have distorted the original concepts of Israel just as assuredly as the Palestinian notion of extermination is founded on a sense of utility.

Often in past years the Israelis have pointed to the amazing strides made in reclaiming the desert and putting it to numerous uses. Yet the Jewish conceptions of progress, and the rights of property betray a strong European bias; the attitude taken has been a straightforward ignoring of the (nomadic) traditions of the desert. The question of rights should not be decided by virtue of the ability of a privileged group to develop someone else's land.

The conflict in the Middle East possesses that same quality which has distinguished many military contests of recent times — a protracted state of antagonism where the tactics of uncertain territorial aims makes a hard and fast conclusion hard to conceive. The renewal of hostilities (from their beginnings in 1948, to 1956, 1967 and now 1973) has simply demonstrated the opening up of wounds which are never allowed to heal. It illustrates the continual state of flux in which the Middle East nations find themselves. The question is always one of interests, self-determination and control rather than a decisive end to hostility by a definitive solution.

The prospect of a concrete homeland must have appeared as a vision to the Jewish people after the ravages of the war in Europe. The blame for today's headlines does not lie with them. The situation of the Arabs in being presented with the establishment of a new state formed by a cohesive force from the outside was unenviable. The fault was not theirs. (Both sides are without fault, but both sides feel oppressed). Yet the problem exists and two facts remain — the Jews must protect what they see as their heritage, and the Arabs must regain what was theirs for centuries; the result is mutual fear and apprehension. The question has evolved even beyond any blame placed on the United Nations; the problem is one of basic human drives and their mournful incompatibility.

What one begins to see is that the surface effects of each succeeding battle have not been essentially transformative. The lives lost and the human energy expended are only a witness to the futility of a complex and resilient problem. An artificial situation created by the ideals of brotherhood, has grown beyond being controllable by the means of its original aims; and mankind must recognize its own ineptitude in being unable to remain reasonable and restrained.

Back referendum but critically

Students at the U of T and other universities around the world have been fighting for a long time for greater representation on important institutional decision-making bodies. More than a struggle for the utopian goal of "broadening the democracy of the university", these attempts have been directed against the authoritarianism, racism, sexism, imperialist ideology, and academic elitism of the bourgeois university.

In so far as today's and tomorrow's SAC referendum poses the need to continue the struggle, students ought to support it and vote "Yes". But from the outset, we must understand that parity or even majorities for students on all the decision-making bodies of the university (including faculty hiring, firing, tenure, etc.) won't even begin to change the class nature of the educational institution.

As the ideological arm of the capitalist state, the university is geared primarily to the reproduction of the existing productive relations in society, and secondarily to the production of knowledge for capitalist enterprise (including the imperialist war industry).

To alter that social function of the university, or the servility of the entire educational system to the capitalist status quo, it will take social revolution. In the meantime, progressive students and faculty must be able to exercise a defensive veto over the most negative decision that come down from the university hierarchy, and resist all attempts to co-opt their leaders onto serving on bodies that run the institution. We must never be able to be held responsible for the running of this class machine, the ideological apparatus of the state itself. Only in its destruction, along with that of the system it serves, can we participate in fully without fear of co-optation.

As for joining the National Union of Students (NUS), the proposition lacks clarity and purpose.

Students can unite only on a political basis for concrete goals. No other unity can merge the objective interests of all students, for such common interests are lacking in any historic sense. From time to time, students can unite on a principled basis, for instance, to oppose fee hikes, or to stand in solidarity with progressive students being persecuted abroad (e.g. Chile). But for these purposes, revolutionary Marxists pose the need for local action committees, linked up nationally, to offer leadership and coordination in specific situations for particular ends. This was the form that successful mass opposition took to the "Debre conscription law" in France last spring, under the leadership of the now-banned Ligue Communiste.

Students are not workers whose exploitation is common within capitalism. A student union only unites the confusion and plethora of interests that the student milieu reflects as a whole, and allows for opportunists and careerists to fill the vacuum at the top of such "unions". If students want a national organization, then the question is one of political program.

Make your vote in the referendum a positive vote for struggle — nothing more, nothing less.

Arabs in Israel treated well

Re: The "unbiased" report by Mr. Rogers on the Middle East war, (Varsity, Oct. 12).

Mr. Rogers wonders why the Arabs started the war because there was "ample evidence that Israel was about to strike," and that Israel would "launch the aggression as, had been the case in 1956, and 1967." We can see that Israel was about to strike. She had not mobilized for a war, nor had she any intention of starting one to further damn her in the eyes of the world and further ruin her economically.

Mr. Rogers fails to mention a few other points that must be achieved before a permanent peace can be attained:

- Israel must be finally recognized as a sovereign nation,

- Israel's boundaries must be safe, secure and internationally recognized.

- Israel must be guaranteed freedom of access to the Suez Canal and other water ways.

Finally Mr. Rogers points out that Arabs in Israel must be put on a par with the Israelis. He fails to mention that since 1967, the Arabs in the occupied territories have been guaranteed jobs which pay far more than they ever received under Arab governments. They are all also given government-sponsored education and medical care. They have all also been properly housed in new, clean modern buildings.

If Mr. Rogers, you would like the Arabs in Israel to be on a par with the Israelis, don't you think it also fair that the Jews in Arab countries should be allowed freedom from the city boundaries imposed upon them by Arab governments, and to be treated like people?

OFS still kicking, convention shows

LONDON, ONT. (CUP) - Improvements in student housing, loans and grants are issues the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) wants to see action on.

One of the goals of OFS is to be a lobby for student interests at the provincial government level.

The federation met this past weekend at Westminster College at the University of Western Ontario and the proposals were contained in a draft report prepared for submission to the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs (CUA) in December.

More than fifteen recommendations were made in the field of financing post-secondary institutions and many of them would bring considerable relief to students paying for their own education.

Some of the proposals were:

- No more fees increases, and a gradual elimination of tuition.

- Extension of the part-time student bursary pilot project to all post-secondary institutions in Ontario.

- Lowering of the present student loan ceiling to $600 for all Ontario students.

- That investigators employed by the government to probe award applications either be clearly defined legally or disbanded.

- A cost of living clause be inserted in to the determination of living allowances for students on loans.

- Broadening of the "independent from parents" classification to take into account the actual status of a student's home situation.

- Extension of the present six-month, interest-free period on student loans to one year after leaving the institution involved.

- Students should not be held responsible for the interest on emergency loans contracted due to slow OSAP loan processing, if the delay is not the student's fault.

A wide ranging report dealing with student housing was also introduced at the conference. Its proposals dealt with six recommendations, most of them directed at local problems in various areas of the province.

A representative of the University of Waterloo said that the problem of apartment owners refusing to rent to students was reaching the point where their newspaper ads openly stated a no-students policy. Consequently one of the report's clauses asked that the Landlord and Tenant Act be amended to prevent this practice.

There was also a request that the Ontario government's survey of student housing be released immediately. The text of the OSF report maintained that the survey had been made at the wrong time of the year, February, when post-Christmas drop-outs are at a peak. The report said that the survey should have been made in September in order to accurately reflect the year's housing requirements.

There was some question as to whether the government study had been complete enough. OSF delegates said that the survey had considered only the number of rooms and beds available, and not the quality of the housing, which may vary widely across a campus.

The government was urged to drop the policy that prevents community colleges from building residences. A representative from London's Fanshawe College said that at present their students must rent apartments in the immediate area of the college, and that rents are disproportionately high.

The restriction had originally been applied to the community colleges to maintain a purely commuter-student body from the area surrounding the college involved. OFS sources said that the increased diversity of community college courses was attracting many students from every part of the province, and the need for residences was clear.

The housing crisis in both the University of Ottawa and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute in Toronto led to a request for immediate release of funds for residences in those locale. Government surveys have already confirmed the housing requirements in these two areas according to OFS.

The federation will present its report to the Committee on University Affairs in Toronto on Dec. 10 this year.

Liberals' secret files reveal exploitation of native peoples

from CANADIAN UNIVERSITY PRESS

When 200 members of the Native Youth Association provided an alternative to the Changing of the Guard on Parliament Hill the morning of August 31, the tourists didn't know which way to look. Voicing traditional and not so traditional chants, the native youth had just come from a peaceful 24 hour occupation of the Indian Affairs building, a few blocks away. (But the headlines had been stolen from them by an angry demonstration of striking railway workers the previous day.)

When smashed filing cabinets from the Office of Assistant Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, John Ciaccia, were found on the roof of the building, with many of their contents missing, more white people sat up and took notice.

Following an anonymous tip to the news magazine, the Last Post, the missing files were recovered from lockers in a Montreal railway station on September 23, but not before copies had been sent to a variety of news media. In co-operation with Akwesasne Notes, the native paper with the largest circulation, Canadian University Press presents a picture of Indian relations with the federal government—an analysis of what was in the missing documents.

The Quebec provincial government, in conjunction with the James Bay Development Corporation, is constructing a massive hydro-electric project in northern Quebec that will have profound effects on the Cree Indians and the Inuit (Eskimos) living in the region.

The native people claim they've never given up the title to the land being used for the project and that the development will seriously alter their lives and make it difficult for them to earn a living.

The indigenous people, environmentalists and other supporters are now involved in a complicated legal and political campaign to halt the project. The James Bay scheme involves the damming of major rivers, the flooding of native settlements and hunting lands, the opening up of the areas to white tourists and businesses, and, as environmentalists point out, the destruction of the area's present ecology.

The federal Liberals chose the 'parti rouge' over native peoples' rights

Although the federal government is entitled to intervene on behalf of the native people in the legal proceedings, it has refused to do so. Confidential documents leaked a year ago indicate that the government's own legal advisors believed that a refusal to protect native people and other federal interests, including navigable waterways, airports, and radio communications could leave the federal government open to a damage suit. But the Department of Indian Affairs adopted a position of non-intervention saying that to do otherwise "would be paternalistic."

Confidential correspondence between the Department of Indian Affairs and the rest of the federal cabinet shows that the cabinet was ready to directly intervene on behalf of the indigenous people but, under pressure from the Bourassa government, decided not to.

At a meeting in May 1972, the federal government's Committee on Federal and Provincial Relations decided "to support the Indian claim to an 'interest' in the project area 'other than that of the Province'" and asserted that "the federal government has a vested interest in the settlement of the Indian claim." The committee was prepared to adopt "all recourses open to it... to achieve provincial recognition of the Indian interests"... including... "withholding support for the power project or approval of or assistance towards various aspects of it."

Documents leaked a year ago show that the Quebec government demanded that the federal government not intervene. So, within a month of the May 1972 committee meeting, federal paddle wheels were going full-steam in reverse and the recently released documents show that the Cabinet committee then decided to peddle a much softer line. The federal government expressed "its concern to the province of Quebec that it (the Quebec government) has decided that the federal government cannot participate in the negotiations..." But it decided to "maintain up-to-date awareness of (the) project (and) keep the James Bay Development Corp. aware of the broad range of federal concerns and interests."

These interests may include the recent negotiations for a federally-financed $30 million deep sea port to serve the James Bay project.

At a June meeting, the cabinet's committee reminded itself that "specialized contacts (should be) kept in proper perspective to the total relationship between the governments on the James Bay projects." In other words, support for the native people should not interfere with relations with the Quebec government. It seems that destroying the Inuit and Cree nations had become an acceptable "if not a small" price to pay to avoid further federal conflicts with Quebec.

In any case, the federal Cabinet, in response to pressure from Quebec, strayed a long way from its original position and from its obligations to the native people and other federal concerns.

Government attempts to buy off native people

The federal government wants to settle native land claims out of court apparently because court settlements would imply that the native people have legal rights rather than indicate dependency upon a "benevolent" Canadian government.

The confidential documents reveal that Indian Affairs Minister Jean Chretien proposed the federal government settle with the native people at a cost of more than $3 billion and many millions of acres of land. The documents, dated last April, if applied to the Yukon and British Columbia alone, would cost more than $600 million and more than 26 million acres of land. After the release of this information, Chretien said he "had nothing to be ashamed of."

(Chretien's proposal is similar to the settlement the American government made in 1971 to Alaskan Indians, a settlement which most Indian people regard as a rip-off. The Alaskan settlement was not based on an actual assessment of land value but on what the Indians thought the US Congress would accept. The Indians gave up all land rights in return for some land and villages, cash settlements, and very low mineral royalties.)

Chretien's documents said it was clear "that the native people had the right to use and occupy the land, and have lost it." The paper ruled out a settlement through legislation or by reference to the Supreme Court of Canada and favoured negotiations. "Negotiations offer the only real prospect of acceptable comprehensive settlements instead oriented to the future and is the most flexible alternative," the paper says.

The document rejects "bargaining position" advanced by the National Indian Council by the House of Commons on Indian Affairs and National statement of rights claim to have aboriginal rights and sovereignty over the land. The issue of aboriginal rights is the dispute between the native people. The Northwest Territories people to file a caveat on the land demonstrates justification in claiming Canada and that many.

And since the federal government is trying very hard to keep the court to prevent them from it is therefore willing to settle. This would be from being able to establish their own, forcing them to rely on the federal government.

And the Indians feel that the federal government jeopardize the special status of the Indian Act. The federal government's cash settlements were to be their level of financial independence. While Indians would go to court many fear these would government financial settlements would lose some of the non-status Indians would settlements. Indians presently resides with the who is and who is not.

Chretien's documents believe that the only legal problems more social and political position seems to be an approach to James Bay settlement of any kind a had to turn to the courts assistance.

When the $3 billion cost to the public, it was rejected by Propaganda material from Quebec's provincial election campaign no longer uses the once popular "Quebec sait faire" slogan. Now the James Bay project has revealed the Liberal party to be a bumbling government?

ment (AIM) spokesman, Mike Myers, a member of the Seneca Nation. He termed the payments "ludicrous," and an AIM press release said that "the spiritual decay of Indian country is at a point where that money would be burned up in a desperate blur of booze, cars and good times." As for Chretien's price, Myers said that the Six Nations at Brantford would alone be entitled to all of it.

The press release warned that cash settlements would create exploitation of native people by native people. "Indian groups will be at each other's throats in a fight for power...the bulk of Indian country would never see the monies or ever feel the result of the expenditures." Myers said that if there were a separate native educational system which would turn out "human beings instead of consumers" and groups who were aware of their spiritual heritage, "perhaps after five or ten years of re-education such a large influx of government money would not be disruptive or squandered."

The Myers statement reaffirmed one of the strongest fears of Indian Affairs officials — that the American Indian Movement, which had until recently been most active in Indian country controlled by the United States, would turn its attention to communities controlled by Canada. Several AIM chapters have already arisen spontaneously in Canada.

Liberals have attempted to buy off other peoples in Western Canada

A confidential 1972-73 management report on the Department of Indian Affairs proposed that the government seek a negotiated settlement of two treaties covering North Alberta, Saskatchewan and the Northwest Territories. As a strategy, it proposed setting aside land for Indians at Hay River, Alberta, according to the strict terms of the treaty. This land, the report says, would not be an Indian reserve under the Indian Act, but the Indian Affairs Department would control and manage the land for the benefit of the band so that funds and leases would go to the band's central funds.

"If this approach proves successful, it may be used for other bands while the Brotherhood works on an overall claim," the report said.

This strategy would settle some of those treaties affected by the filing of a caveat by the Northwest Territories' native people. In the court hearings to determine whether the native people would be allowed to file a caveat, native translators testified that they didn't translate sections of the treaties involving the surrender of the lands. Other older natives people testified that they were not aware of any clause concerning the lands.

The native people claim that they didn't sign anything giving up their rights to the land. They say they thought it was purely a friendship treaty.

A negotiated settlement of these treaties would prevent any native attempt to have the treaties invalidated and to establish legal ownership of the land.

Hay River is one area where status and non-status Indians have formed a coalition. Since the terms of the treaties excluded non-status Indians, any negotiations would damage the coalition and split the opposition to the government's Indian policies.

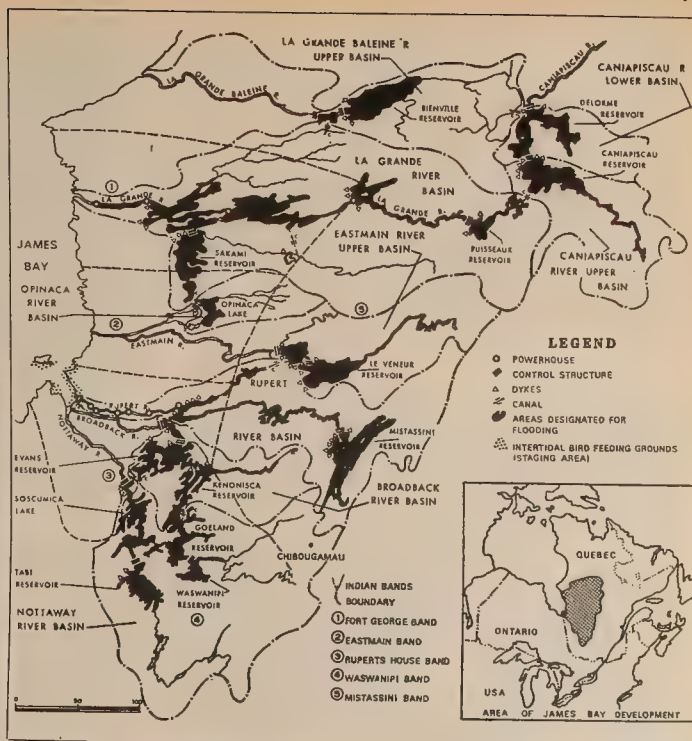

This scheme requires that the native people not be allowed to administer the land. There is a mechanism to transfer management of the land from the government to the band but it is based on the government's perception of "fitness" to manage. Consequently, the government will usually only turn lands over to people who take a government position and who are "good managers" in the white man's terms.

Indian Affairs also set a goal of getting 322 Indian children adopted over the course of the fiscal year. It notes that 2,184 Indian children were adopted over the last 10 years—1,625 by non-Indians and only 559 by Indian families. The department also reported that most of the proposed increase in the adoption rate can be expected from non-Indian families.

Claiming that non-Indian people get preferential treatment in the adoption of Indian children, the Indian newspaper Akwesasne Notes has asked its non-Indian friends not to adopt Indian children until Indians get fairer treatment from the adoption agencies.

The newspaper says the problem is not so much racial as a difference of culture and of perceptions of parenthood and the family. The agency, being part of the white society, judges an Indian family that wants to adopt in terms of the prevailing culture. Therefore, Indian people are generally judged as unacceptable parents because the social workers fail to understand the rearing of children in Indian society.

The management report shows how white the Indian Affairs department actually is. While one would assume that the parks branch, for instance, would be a logical employer of native people, there are only 11 natives out of some 2,291 employees. There are 878 administrators in the department but only 16 are native persons. The Indian Affairs Department has about one native person out of every six employees, but more than half of these people are employed in lower-level jobs.

"A backlash from dissident environmentalists"

Another document dealt with the construction of the Mackenzie Highway, announced in April by Prime Minister Trudeau. The Mackenzie River corridor would also provide a pipeline route and mining exploitation of the Northwest Territories' lands—all this before native claims in that area had been settled.

"A backlash of dissident voices must be expected from environmentalists" the document warns, but it expected that a simultaneous announcement of government willingness to settle treaties with northern Indians would silence any native opposition to the road. It noted that native people do not generally object to projects which ignore their rights but bring certain benefits, and suggested that publicity pointing out advantages to native people would also moderate native complaints.

One document, written in 1971, urged the cabinet to reject the option of actively promoting the Canadian route over the Alaskan route, and to merely say it was willing to consider an application for an oil pipeline in the north. Consequently, the government did not strongly advocate a Canadian pipeline — although many Canadian businessmen would like to see it — and sidestepped native and environmentalist opposition to the pipeline by taking no position.

Cabinet was told that the government's announced intention to negotiate settlements of Indian claims "could be a stabilizing factor, but any apparent failure to follow through or undue delay in negotiating native grievances might easily be exploited by militant elements, with potentially far-reaching emotional effects."

The confidential documents cited other options, for example the creation of a Canadian version of a US Claims Commission which would likely cost Canada $2.5 billion. The US Claims Commission acts as a court to adjudicate Indian land and treaty claims but many Indians are dissatisfied with settlements they've received from it. The largest land settlement the commission has ever given was one dollar per acre.

The documents also suggest that a fixed lump sum could be set on a per capita basis. A payment of $10,000 per person was suggested. But any negotiated settlement involving the government paying large amounts of money to the native people without a court judgement leaves open the possibility that other federal aid to Indians will be cut off, leaving government funding lower, or at its present level.

Yukon land claims fit nicely

A confidential Indian Affairs analysis of the Yukon Native Brotherhood's position paper on land rights indicates that the Brotherhood's position fits in nicely with the government's own ideas of what native people should be all about.

The Yukon claim was not based so much on legal or aboriginal rights but on moral rights and needs. The government, the documents show, has always been concerned that the native people gain no legal foothold in court but that they remain at the government's mercy in negotiations.

So quite logically it prefers the social and moral arguments to the legal.

"There is a fine balance between pride in one's Indianness and way of life," the report says, "and encouragement of inward-looking xenophobia which could lead to an undesirable alienation of a minority group from the main society." It added that scattered throughout the Brotherhood's paper was "a bow in the direction of Jean-Jacques Rousseau's concept of the noble savage, and it would be unfortunate if the Yukon Native Brotherhood paid much more than lip service to it." A more than superficial analysis of the "noble savage" argument would involve consideration of aboriginal rights, something the federal government badly wants to avoid.

However, one problem was foreseen concerning the retention of hunting, fishing, and trapping rights by Yukon natives. "It will be hard to convince Indians who regard themselves as natural ecologists that majority societal needs must have priority," the report says. It suggests making the concession of some specific areas for Indian hunting and fishing, and giving Indians a portion of big game hunting licenses, since this was a subject "particularly galling to Indians."

The native people have maintained that their "natural ecology" stems from the fact that since they are working the land they would be foolish to abuse it.

The Indian Affairs analysis also feared giving Yukon natives any controls or substantial royalties from mineral development. "It would not serve the best long-term interests of the Indians if concessions awarded them today should involve them tomorrow in bitter controversies with the majority society, whose needs for scarce resources were jeopardized by terms of a rigid settlement," it says. However, native spokesmen note that their people form a majority in the Yukon and Northwest Territories, and that if that area were a province, native people would form the government with rights to the mineral resources.

Also hinted in the report was the rationale behind the government providing conservatively-minded native organizations with the funds to research and present claims. (The government has provided funds to some native organizations to research their position in the land claims and treaty disputes.) Indians must feel that there was no lack of resources leading to "acceptance of a settlement less equitable than might otherwise have been the case. Justice must be seen to be done," the report said. The government has tried to imply that there is equal strength on both sides of the bargaining table, but it financially supports those bargaining agents it agrees with.

No startling new facts

The recently released secret documents do not make known many startling new facts. But they do provide an important overview of the federal government's manner of handling native demands for their rights. They also show that the cabinet very much wants to keep the native claims out of court so any negotiations that take place can be on the government's terms.

Rochdale before courts

The Ontario Supreme Court is now hearing a case which could result in the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) foreclosing its first mortgage on Rochdale College.

Complicating the issue is Revenue Properties Ltd. holder of the fifth mortgage which feels the CMHC mortgage is illegal and therefore Revenue Properties should be the holder of the first mortgage.

Spokesmen at Rochdale College say that "the issue is so complicated that reporters couldn't follow."

Rochdale will attempt to have the courts force Clarkson Company which handles its finances to turn over the financial accounts of the college to its residents.

Residents feel that they have a right to know how their money is being spent. One spokesman said that Clarkson is "spending money on its own paramilitary force," namely the security guards. Up to 50 per cent of the budget was earmarked for security.

No matter which way the Ontario Supreme Court rules, the loser will appeal, according to Rochdale residents, through the federal courts.

Rochdale is in receivership because of failure to keep up with mortgage payments. Creditors claim the college now close to $5 million behind.

No to unification

The question about a "unified directorate" on today's student referendum is a matter of concern to many women who are active within the Benson Building, including those in the Physical Education course.

A second year PHE student, said "basically, women students are satisfied with the (athletic) program." She stated that it is "impractical" to unite the directorates because women's sports are usually "recreational" and mens' are often "competitive" in nature.

This student argued that "judging by the treatment in the Varsity article" the mens' athletic directory "wouldn't give a shit" about the women's program if the directorates were unified.

She pointed out that "amalgamation for a lot of women signifies coed activities" but these are already accommodated within the present program.

Several non PHE participants in the Benson Building program, when asked, were unanimous in their opposition to a unified directorate.

Power through the people

While residents in western Ontario are protesting Ontario Hydro's proposed 500 kilovolt power line to Toronto, Hydro is opening up two weeks of public hearings this week on another 500 kilovolt line proposed to go around the Golden Horseshoe.

Both lines are part of a proposed network of high voltage lines in southern Ontario linking various nuclear generating plants to the Metro Toronto area.

The Nanticoke to Pickering line which has the public hearings opening up, runs roughly from the north shore of Lake Erie west of Niagara Falls around Hamilton and Toronto to Pickering just east of Toronto.

The public hearings by Hydro are to allow citizens to participate in the decision of where the line is to go, Hydro says.

The public hearings are the culmination of a two-year-long citizen protest over the power lines led by Lee Symmes, a Chinguacousy Township farmer.

Rural citizen protest is fairly new, and over the two-year struggle, Symmes says his views have changed from not wanting the power line in his own backyard to a view that where-ever the general good is served best is where the line should go.

This view is in sharp contrast to the citizen group formed to protest the Bruce Complex power line to Toronto. Located about 180 miles west and north of Toronto on Lake Huron, the Bruce nuclear generating complex has not progressed to the point where public hearings are slated for its 500 kilovolt line.

The Keep the Power Here (KPH) group protesting the Bruce line objects to Hydro's entire approach to citizen participation.

Spokesman Clifford Brown says that Hydro "pre-empt" the issue by only allowing citizens to debate where the line should go rather than allowing citizens to participate in the decision of whether the power is needed in Toronto in the first place.

Likewise KPH objects to the potential environmental issues and possible dangers of nuclear leakage associated with the massive projects.

When completed some years from now, the three nuclear generating stations—Nanticoke, Bruce Complex, and Pickering—will be linked by the two 500 kilovolt lines across hundreds of miles to provide electricity for Toronto.

New union suffers setback

Organized labor's drive to unionize clerical workers suffered a defeat on a close vote when clerical employees at the Canadian Underwriters' Association (CUA) turned down certification by the Association of Commercial and Technical Employees (ACTE).

Ivor Oram, of ACTE, said in an interview Tuesday, that the vote shows the company has found loopholes to try to slow down the ACTE drive.

"Employees have been very responsive," he said. He attributed the failure of the CUA vote to delaying tactics by the company and a 54 per cent turnover rate of employees.

Oram said it took two months to sign up the workers in the organizing drive, but it was another six and a half months to get the certification vote taken due to loopholes in provincial legislation which allowed the company to use stalling tactics.

ACTE is an association of directly-chartered locals of the Canadian Labor Congress with a budget of almost $500,000 to organize clerical workers.

The organizing drive has centred mainly in Metro Toronto, but has now expanded to three locals in British Columbia. There is also some talk among ACTE organizers about expanding into Montreal.

Oram said he does not view the CUA vote as a defeat, since six months from now a new vote can be taken, the minimum waiting period required by the Ontario Labor Relations Act.

Local 1701 of ACTE, the CUA local, started with 122 members in May, but attrition and the 54 per cent turnover rate reduced the number to 97 by the time the vote came up.

The final vote tallied last week was 44 in favor of the union, 48 opposed, two abstentions, and three spoiled ballots.

ACTE has won a certification vote among workers at the CUA-affiliated Underwriters Laboratories of Canada in Scarborough by a margin of 38 out of 60 employees.

A certification vote requires 50 per cent of the workers plus one for certification of the union.

The ACTE drive to organize white collar workers is aimed at Canada's property and casualty insurance companies, banks, and other concentrations of white-collar workers.

The past returns: Spadina streetcars may soon be back

By BOB BETTSON

Streetcars will be returning to Spadina Avenue in the near future if Toronto Transit Commission Chairman Karl Mallette follows up a promise last Wednesday to implement the proposal, advanced during the summer by the Streetcars for Toronto Committee (STC).

The reason for the return of streetcars to the route between King and Bloor is to "offer a better quality of service than the 35 buses now operating on the route," according to Andy Biemiller, a U of T professor who worked on the proposal for STC.

Right now the Spadina bus is one of the most heavily used in Toronto, and streetcars which have a higher passenger capacity would improve service.

Biemiller said the TTC now has a surplus of 40 streetcars while buses are at a premium. The use of streetcars would also increase the speed of transporting the estimated 6,000 riders per hour during rush hours.

Part of the proposal is an exclusive right of way for street cars during rush hours which could increase the speed by 25 per cent and make Spadina less attractive to automobiles.

The Spadina car was discontinued in 1948 and the last regular route using the tracks, the Harbord car, was ended in 1966. The tracks below College Street were used this summer for the tour tram operated as a tourist attraction for downtown Toronto.

Restoring the tracks north of College to Bloor Street and building loops at the end of the route would cost an estimated $800,000 according to the proposal. However, the committee estimated that more than $1.5 million could be saved in the next ten years compared to the cost of running buses.

Advantages would include elimination of air pollution and noise from buses which now mar the heavily travelled route.

The proposal was sent to the TTC this summer and received a favorable response, Biemiller said, but the group had heard "nothing more" until Mallette announced implementation of the scheme in a speech last week.

The only negative response to the project has been from David Goodman of Citor Goodman Furs on Spadina who opposes making a right of way for street cars because of the effect on angle parking on Spadina.

Biemiller however feels that angle parking would not be affected, contending that taking buses off Spadina would free the right hand lanes.

Lead levels tested

About 700 people in the city's east-end Riverdale area were tested Monday for lead levels in their blood.

The people either live or go to school near the Eastern Avenue-Leslie Street plant of Canada Metals Ltd., a plant which recycles lead from various sources.

Dallard Runge, of the Neighbourhood Renewal Corporation, said the tests were done on adults living within a 1,000 foot radius of the plant, pre-schoolers in the same area, and children who attend the Bruce Public School which is about 600 feet from the plant.

A provincial government study showed higher than normal lead levels in the soil. The air management branch of the ministry of environment reported last December that lead levels in soil around the plant were as much as 68 times higher than normal and said they were "among the highest ever recorded in Metro Toronto".

Ma Bell challenges phone freaks

By DICK BROWN

A new challenge for the phone freaks with blue boxes has been created by Bell Canada.

Described in glowing detail in Bell News, the phone company's house organ, is the innovation of phoning a department store computer and ordering direct from the computer using a touch-tone phone.

Not only that, Ma Bell's new system provides a talking computer, shades of 1984.

The whole effort is being jointly tried on an experimental basis by Bell Canada, Simpson-Sears Ltd., and International Business Machines.

According to Mother Bell, the touch-tone caller phones the Simpson-Sears IBM computer during a set one-hour period during the day and places his order with the computer, who politely drones back the programmed reply.

The orders can be either COD or charge account.

Ma Bell's newspaper did not mention, however, one of the fastest growing underground rip-offs around, the phone freak and his blue box.

A blue box is an electronic device which allows midnight phone skulkers to make virtually unlimited long distance calls for no charge. While some phone freaks have been arrested for this practice, there still seem to be a few around.

The phone company has security precautions it uses for free-loading long distance calls, but nowhere did the Bell news blurb indicate what sort of precautions it was taking against phone faking the Simpson-Sears IBM computer catalogue.

Long distance phone freaks are frequently caught, according to Bell officials, by a peculiarity of long distance computer billing of any long-distance call.

That method of tracing works because all long distance calls cross trails with the long distance computer, and Bell officials are beginning to get wise to how the computer registers a phone freak by-passing the computer.

However, local calls are not plugged into the long distance computer, and the unanswered question from the Simpson-Sears computer catalogue system is: does the Simpson-Sears IBM have a "fail-safe" mechanism against phone freaks?

The idea of using the telephone as an extension of the computer networks surrounding modern life is not new.

Bell reports that General Motors of Canada Ltd. has been using a touch-tone entry into GM's computer for some time. The auto-maker's computer has a voice which tells car dealers where a new car is on the assembly line and when it will be shipped.

A hardware store chain uses a similar system to order supplies.

Speedy Muffler King, whose advertising claims "at Speedy, you're a somebody," uses the telephone system to order parts from a computer.

The Bell company gurgles on that the catalogue's talking computer heralds a new age and that "it is likely that other uses of the touch tone telephone as a home computer access terminal will be developed."

With 63 per cent of Toronto's phone users having touch-tons, Bell says it is confident their new system will expand.

Model choo-choos keep TTC busy

It's the closest the Toronto Transit Commission is going to get to playing with model trains.

While the average model train fanatic may spend a few hundred dollars on his spread, the TTC is dropping $46,899 on a simulated model of the subway system done by a computer.

Rather than watching a little toy train and rolling stock whirl around the tracks, TTC has assigned the Canada Systems Group to dig through computer readouts of simulated subway runs.

The purpose of this is to try test runs of new subway scheduling and patterns to try to help alleviate the "sardine-can" syndrome at rush hour.

The Metro Executive Committee approved the financial arrangements which have the province paying $35,174 and the TTC paying $11,725.

No deadline for the completion of the studies is scheduled, a TTC official admitted, but the plan is to work as quickly as possible on figuring out how to speed up the number of trains per hour running.

Other factors to be studied include the impact of staggered work hours by downtown firms. Queen's Park workers will begin staggered hours by October 29. U of T has yet to try the plan with its clerical workers.

The one subway feature which will not be tried even on the computer is the "Y" interchange involving the St. George, Museum, and Bay subway stops. TTC officials say there are no plans to put it back into use either on the real thing or on the computer.

Field hockey second

York hosted its traditional earlybird field hockey tournament last weekend. Thirteen teams from 10 universities began competition at nine on Friday morning in a fog so dense you could hardly see to mid-field.

Toronto seniors bullied off against McMaster first. Mc's strong forward line gave our defence some tense moments, but good clearing by rookie goalie, Liz Novachis, sent the ball up to the forward line. The Blues succeeded in rushing through Mac's defence to score two goals. Both by right inner, Pat Williams. Although hampered by the fog, the defence shutout McMaster for a final result of 2-0.

With the fog partly lifted, Toronto next played York. The host team ran well, catching the U of T flat-footed, intercepting passes, tackling the forwards on their dodges and blocking shots on goal. Blues' forwards muddled on the pitch and hung back instead of rushing for goal. The defence couldn't pull together enough to keep York from scoring and Toronto lost 2-0.

Dispirited by the previous game, Toronto played a down-in-the-mouth game against Guelph. They Gryphon line-up showed experience and finesse, maneuvering Toronto out of position to score two unanswered goals.

A long-standing rivalry and a team discussion boosted Toronto's morale for the final game of the day against Queen's. The game was not as swinging and wide open as it could have been, but the players were communicating with one another. Pat Williams got a clean drive into the goal and right wing Pam Dunbar tipped the ball in on a rush as Toronto finished the day on a happy note, winning 2-0.

The team opened the next day versus a reputedly weak Western team. At first Blues floundered a little, and the Londoners made it down to the Toronto defensive circle more than once. Eventually they got untracked.

A shot by Dyannah Prentice, centre forward, was deflected into the goal by Western's defence, and Dunbar smashed in a goal on a cross pass through the circle. Western never recovered and Toronto took it, 2-0.

U of T's next opponent was McGill, who showed surprising strength as compared with last year's weak finish. The game was fast and wide-open. Blues' forwards kept themselves well-spaced on the pitch for long cross passing. The halfbacks followed the forwards closely, feeding the ball back into the circle and allowing the forwards to remain on the attack.

An accurate pass from left wing Barb Richardson to left inner Jennifer Dakin resulted in a much-needed goal. McGill pushed back, looking for a goal of their own, but fullbacks Chris Crawford and Sue Scott adeptly kept the ball going away.

The next Toronto goal came during a rush in the circle. Right inner Williams drove the ball up to the far corner of the goal, making it another 2-0 win for Toronto.

Blues' final game was against OWIAA finalists, Waterloo. However, many of Waterloo's stronger players graduated last year. A tired U of T team managed to keep the ball in their offensive end but couldn't put it in the net. The only score came on a fast break by Williams as she dodged past the Waterloo fullbacks and around the goalie to gain a 1-0 victory.

Although the results don't count in league standings, they were recorded: Guelph won, with five wins and two ties. McGill and Toronto tied for second with the Montreals getting four wins and two ties. Toronto five wins.

The intermediates fared better, as they tied with McMaster in intermediates for first place. They beat Ottawa 5-0 and Laurentian 4-0, and tied Queen's 0-0 and Mac 1-1.

Both teams travel to Waterloo this weekend for an invitational tournament that includes two American teams.

Dale Lieberman reports on women's tennis... Toronto won the eastern division of the OWIAA last weekend at Carleton, suffering only one loss, to finish with 22 points to McMaster's 18.

Results: Singles - Barbara Brankovsky over Barb Woodley (Mac) 2-6, 6-1, 6-1 and over Janis Steele (Carleton) 6-0, 6-0. Ulrika Bundesmann over Barb Lyon (Carleton) 6-0, 6-1; over Wendy Walters (McMaster) 6-1, 6-3; and over Trent's Nathalie MacFarlane 6-0, 6-4.

Doubles - Ann Marie Crabbe and Wendy Stone over Anne Fairlie and Lorraine Murray (Trent) 6-0, 6-0; over Maureen Burns and Nancy Gilchrist (Carleton) 6-1, 6-2, and lost to Janice Murdock and Laurie McLean (McMaster) 0-6, 0-2. Susan Chow and Sheila MacDonald over Linda Kelly and Donna Harrison (McMaster) 6-3, 7-5 and over Liz Margesson and Caroline Bagley (Trent) 6-0, 6-0.

beaver ponds, running through swampy marshland, hiking rocky slopes, slopping through endless paths of rocks, roots, mud, mud and more mud, with a beaver dam for good measure, all went together to form the 1973 Ontario Cross-country championships in Sudbury on Saturday.

Paul Williams, a high schooler running for the U of T Track Club, and Mike Dyon suffered even more since it rained throughout the juvenile race. Williams ran second with Dyon on his heels for third.

Brad Morley ran a strong race to take the junior division, while Greg Lockhart was off form in 12th. John Sharp won the Senior title over 12000 metres.

A second team from Toronto ran in a meet at York on Saturday, finishing fifth.

Vic leading soccer, PHE takes track

Soccer by Chris Robinson

Vic is tearing up the first division with a team effort based 10 per cent on skill and 90 per cent on determination. The Redmen slipped by defending champs Eng on the strength of a goal by Regan and a hotly disputed lucky push-in by Lowe during a goalmouth melee. As usual, Pereira scored for Eng, while Vic solidified its position on top of the league.

In the second division, Meds and PHE kept pace at the top. The doctors trimmed Trin A 4-1 on a pair by Boyd, singles by Bluseys and Sasson, with Parker counting for the losers on a 40 yard field goal. The jocks took the dentists 2-1 on a pair by Courtis with Palermo replying.

The third division featured most of the action, as Eng III, Grads, and Pharmacy continued undefeated. Eng III knocked Knox 3-0 on goals by Lum, Lue, and a dry Sherry. Then they emasculated Emmanuel 8-0 (Ketchen 3, Duerte, Yun, Tang, Wright, and Kurford).

Grads and the druggists collided head-on for a 0-0 tie. The architects continued their drive for a play-off spot by edging a slumping Trin B 1-0 on Bettio's marker, after Trins missed a penalty kick. Pharmacy then grabbed a quick two goal lead against Trin B on a pair by Bradley against Chapman's score and held on. The game was noticeably calmer after Bradley and Trin goalie Onions sent each other to the health service.

Interfac Track Meet

The Varsity track and field team dominated the annual meet at Varsity Stadium. Eric Little of Scarborough successfully defended the Chancellor Cody trophy for the individual scoring most points. PHE successfully defended its team title, with 41 points. Vic was runner-up with 37, followed by Knox with 22, and Scarborough with 20.

side. UC, the motliest crew of unlikies, managed to field a team to face the fresh-faced hordes from Scarborough but failed in their game effort for victory, emerging with a 13-13 tie.

To chants of "win it for Golda" and "on to Damascus", Lorne Young kicked, blitzed and bit again for UC. Add to this the inspiration he represents to his team-mates and he clearly deserves the title of "best in interfac".

The other dominating factor in the game was the wind. Scar came out with a good game plan — hit UC where it's most vulnerable, with the pass. Their attack was swept away with the wind and it looked like they were going to be swept away with it except for a strong defence.

UC counted first with QB Ben Furd sprinting outside the slow-flicking Scar defence, which had anticipated a goal-line drive. The convert was blocked Young launched the ensuing kick-off into the end zone for a single, aided by a friendly tail wind.

In the third quarter Bruce McGillivray grabbed a quick break-out (UC's only effective pass) for a

TD. Scar snowed them on the convert.

The rest of the half saw Scarborough's defence hand the game to its offence. First linebacker Alex Morin picked off a pass. The offence sputtered after a completed desperation pass from halfback Russ Henderson.

UC took over but had a quick kick blocked by Scar defensive back Jim Abe. The offence proceeded to fumble and UC lineman Jeff Shankman recovered.

The fourth quarter was all Scarborough. QB Joe Swider's passes finally found "elastic man" Andy Pylpiv on a 30 yard post and a 60 yard fly pattern, for two majors. Pylpiv, who played barefoot, was deemed to have "won his boots." Don Ellis hit the first but missed the winning convert.

In an attempt to psyche Scar in the closing moments UC coach Larry Banack asked for a measurement of a long-haired suburbanite, contending that he was a girl. The ref managed to remain oblivious to this tactic and looked on while UC fought vainly for a win until the last seconds.

Referendum: Voting "yes" all the way!

By BOB BETTSON

U of T students yesterday overwhelmingly voted in favour of parity - student faculty representation on hiring firing tenure and promotion committees.

With the final ballots still to be counted more than 6,300 students or about 30 per cent of those eligible, voted 4,121 to 2,039 with 161 abstentions in favour of parity representation.

Students endorsed joining the National Union of Students by a margin of four to one, voting 4,760 to 1,219 with 336 abstentions. The SAC position favouring a combined athletic directorate with a student majority was also decisively approved by a vote of 4,919 to 1,108 with 283 abstentions.

Student representation on staffing committees gained even more support than parity, racking up an eight to one margin in favour. The vote was 5,466 in favor with only 789 opposed and 47 abstentions.

Only ballots from Architecture Dentistry, Music and Physical Education remain to be counted. The turnout at these boxes was estimated at about 300.

The resounding victory for all four questions dispelled some myths that have long existed about voting patterns on these issues. This was the first university wide vote on parity representation and the suburban campuses as well as the professional faculties voted in favour.

Large margins were also rolled up at New College and at the science buildings, traditionally considered more conservative than the arts colleges.

The vote in favor of joining the new National Union of Students was larger than the vote in favor of pulling out of NUS' successor, the Canadian Union of Students in 1969.

The conclusive vote in favour of student control of an integrated athletic directorate indicated strong student opposition to the present situation where students provide most of the funding yet have a minority voice.

The turnout of 30 per cent was lower than last year's fees referendum but higher than many other referenda and most SAC elections in recent history.

More important it represented a large vote of confidence in the SAC position favoring parity student-faculty representation on staffing committees which has been rejected by the university administration and the faculty. The highest margins in favor of parity representation on staffing committees were at Scarborough and Erindale where the margins were three to one and five to one respectively. Also with large margins in favor of parity were the polls at St. Mike's, the Ramsay Wright building, New College and Innis College.

The only college or faculty to defeat any question on the referendum was Trinity defeating parity by a margin of 152 to 139.

Parity was also approved by narrower margins in Law, Engineering, Victoria College. The engineering vote in favor of parity was 176 to 119.

Margins in favour of student representation on staffing committees ran uniformly high at about eight to one.

The margin in favour of joining the National Union of Students was highest at Sidney Smith with a margin of eight to one. Large margins were also registered at Erindale Scarborough Victoria and St. Mike's. The NUS vote was never less than two to one in favour.

The victory for student control on a joint mens and womens athletic directorate also rang up large majorities with resounding margins again at Sidney Smith, Scarborough, Erindale, Victoria and St. Mike's. Like the other questions there were few narrow margins with most carrying by three or four to one in favour.

Anderson: "SAC now has mandate"

It wasn't so much that students approved of the position the Student's Administrative Council put to the referendum yesterday, but the mandate was given to SAC to proceed, said SAC president Bob Anderson last night.

"It gives SAC a mandate to proceed with the policy we developed," he said.

The turnout of about 30 per cent of the students eligible to vote, Anderson said, shows "there is no evidence the student movement is dead. This confirms the interest of students."

"We're very pleased with it," Anderson said, adding that the 30 per cent turnout was higher than the turnout in last spring's elections.

"We demonstrated that students do not accept the Foster report," Anderson said. The Foster report on academic appointments and tenure issued its report in August calling for no student participation in tenure or staffing decisions.

Anderson said he will be in contact with university president John Evans in the next few days, and "if he (Evans) does not reply, we will take further steps."

He refused to say what the further steps would be.

The question on joining the National Union of Students won handily, and Anderson said SAC will move immediately to become a member of NUS.

"Our joining will be a great psychological lift to NUS. This will encourage recruitment.

The four to one margin for approval of a combined mens and womens athletic directorate with student parity, Anderson said, shows the students want a say in their athletic facilities.

He said implementation of the directorate proposal should begin right away, and added: "I don't think the university can refuse."

Michel Chartrand, speaking at OCE auditorium, called Canada's dealings with post-coup Chile "sordid"

Chartrand denounces coup

By BRIAN CONRAD

Quebec labor leader Michael Chartrand denounced the military coup in Chile, claiming "it is the worst repression we have ever heard of in Latin America."

Speaking before a packed auditorium at the College of Education last night, Chartrand said that the coup had a certain inevitable character about it.

One of the reasons the military acted was because of the high level of political consciousness among Chilean workers, he said.

They were "too politically conscious," he said. "They are the best working class in the world."

Chartrand told the cheering audience: "I have great respect for Allende. He tried to do what he asked to do."

Alluding to reports of American support of the coup, Chartrand said: "We must remember that in Chile it is democracy and the working class which has been crushed by international imperialism."

Chartrand called for an International Red Cross investigation into atrocities reported to have been committed by the Chilean military.

He said Allende and his movement to bring socialism to Chile provided a common denominator to bring together different left wings groups in the working class in effecting social change.

Chartrand condemned External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp for his hurried recognition of the military junta's government.

"We are going along with this as we did with American involvement in Vietnam and Cuba."

He also had sharp words for the smug attitudes Canadians take toward international affairs.

"We in Canada are sophisticated colonials and have a standard of living which enables us to have toilet paper with flowers and perfume."

He explained that in Montreal there are toilet paper dispensers with built in music boxes. "We can now shit in harmony," he said.

Also speaking to the meeting was NDP MP John Rodriguez, who said: "The bodies were barely cold" when Canada recognized the junta.

He said that in recognizing the junta so quickly the Canadian government had acted "sordidly."

Rodriguez said that when he asked External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp why Canada acted so quickly, Sharp replied that other countries, such as the Vatican, had already recognized the junta.

Rodriguez also pressed for an investigation of the Canadian ambassador Andrew Ross' conduct after the coup.

duct after the coup.

Ross was not in Chile at the time of the military coup, but returned shortly afterwards to find a small number of Chileans had taken refuge in the Canadian embassy located on the 10th floor of a downtown office building.

After his return, eyewitness accounts report the doors to the embassy were locked shut with an embassy employee posted outside whose instructions were only to let in those persons holding Canadian passports.

One eyewitness said embassy personnel were under instructions to phone junta authorities to come and get any further Chileans who were able to enter the embassy and refused to leave.

In 1971 the Canadian government cut off export credits to Chile, replacing them briefly in 1973 to close a 5 million dollar aircraft deal with the Chilean military command, Rodriguez said.

Dennis McDermott, Canadian UAW leader, who also spoke to the gathering said that this action contributed to the economic chaos in Chile and that the "64 dollar question" is whether or not the Canadian government will continue the freeze.

McDermott ended his remarks by terming the junta as "a military dictatorship of blood, hatred and revenge."

Student lack judgement: Yates

By BOB BETTSON

Students should not be represented on hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure committees. They lack the necessary experience and maturity to make the judgement required."

That familiar line was repeated again by U of T Faculty Association vice-president Keith Yates at a Trinity college debate Monday on the resolution, "students are the best judges of teaching ability."

Yates also a member of the Forster task force on academic appointments admitted that "students are in an excellent position to evaluate teaching in a limited sense but this is only one way."

However he maintained that several other methods of evaluating teaching are equally as important and "neither involve students."

The alternatives Yates offered were retrospective evaluations by former students and assessment of other professors. He stated: "it is difficult to argue that undergraduates are the best judges of teaching ability."

Yates argued that the university is all about research and learning.

"They are equally important." He maintained that research is "complementary" to teaching.

"The strength of the university is in its individual staff members. It is self-evident that staff members are better equipped to make judgements than students who have taken one, three or ten courses in a discipline."

"Tenure judgements are professional decisions that should be made by professionals," he added.

"Professors have a right to be judged by their peers, practitioners who are as experienced as themselves."

Yates claimed that if students were faced with the choice between an excellent teacher who was a barely competent researcher and a poorer teacher who was an outstanding, researcher, he would choose the second and students would choose the first.

"The first professor wouldn't sustain good teaching if only barely competent a research," he maintained.

"Scholarship is just as important if not more important than teaching ability."

Yates lashed out at statements made by the Students Administrative Council, calling them "errant nonsense." He dismissed accusations that professors are "often denied tenure purely because of personality conflicts with senior colleagues", saying that if this ever happens there is "adequate recourse to appeal."

"What it comes down to is achieving a balance between teaching and research," he concluded.

"Anyone who thinks that teaching is not important part of tenure decisions is wrong. The majority of time is spent discussing teaching ability."

The significance of Yates remarks at the debate is that the UTFA has made few public statements on the issue of student representation on hiring, firing, promotion, and tenure committees. A confidential brief was submitted to president John Evans during the period before the release of the Forster report.

This is normal procedure at the Artistic strike. The arrests so far number over 60.

Business usual at Artistic plant

A rally in support of the striking workers at Artistic Woodwork will be held Saturday at noon in front of the Jarvis Street police headquarters, just south of Bloor Street.

The police headquarters was selected by the strike support committee because the rally is also to protest police intimidation of strikers.

So far more than 60 pickets have been arrested, including Alderman Dan Heap, as police daily push aside strikers to allow non-union workers to enter the strike-bound plant.

This past week has brought a marked increase in picket line activity. The picket line has swelled in numbers and police also have come out in increasing numbers.

Secret ceremony today: Varsity hack dance

That quaint institution, the Varsity staff meeting, will indeed take place today as the bell tolls one. What transpires, no one knows, but rumour has it that campus query will again surface and of course the ongoing discussion of reductions of the number of issues. So if you want to see the Varsity three days a week, two days a week or not at all, come and tell us. New staff welcomes with open arms, red carpets and all that stuff. 1 of the clock at 91 St. George St., 2nd floor.

Just 10 minutes after Governing Council opened its debate on the sale of its property at 188 Yonge Street, it approved the sale to the Fairview Corporation.

It was hardly a debate, either. The only ruffle was from student member Gord Barnes who rose to ask if any administration member not on council should declare a conflict of interest. A quiet "no" greeted his inquiry and the vote passed by an overwhelming majority.

Lawyers find usual loophole

Around the table at last night's Council meeting: student governor David Shindman, V.E. Graham, Ralph Campbell, Patti Fleury, James Joyce and the back of Gwen Russell

Last month W. B. Harris had declared a conflict of interest and did not participate in the vote.

Naomi Bilton, owner of the Land before her death in 1922, willed the property to the university on the condition that it never be sold to the Tm Eaton Company or any firm representative Eaton's.

Fairview Corp. is the firm assembling land on the Yonge Street site slated to become a complex of stores which is planned to include an Eaton's store.

Council member James H. Joyce said that Fairview "is a public company... not an Eaton Co. company," with shares for sale on the Montreal, New York and Toronto stock exchanges. Joyce is chairman of the business

The clause had sent university solicitors scrambling to their law books to see if the sale would be lawful. The lawyers reported back that it would.

The sale price of the property was not revealed at the meeting.

After an introduction by council member Barry Mitchell an unscheduled speaker rose at the end of the meeting with matter not on council's agenda.

"I wish to make a general statement about racism and the teaching of racism at the University of Toronto," student activist Tony Leah told Governing Council last night, but council wouldn't let him.

Meanwhile, his fellow members of Students for a Democratic Society were distributing literature to council

Harding offered to meet with Leah after the meeting to suggest the proper mechanism for bringing complaints about Hector to the university's attention.

In other council business two documents classified as confidential were approved by council - the U of T draft report to the Committee on University Affairs, which will hold its hearings on U of T at Erindale November 26, and the university's audited financial statement.

Prof. W. B. Coutts seemed upset by what he termed "the anomalous situation of discussing something in public that the public can't see" but Harding said the university system for classifying documents is "the best makeshift solution available."

Student Movement Not dead

Last Monday new College principal Don Ivey said that "we don't know what constitutes good teaching." Ivey was naturally referring to the faculty opinion, or at least his view of it. But yesterday's referendum results seem to indicate that over 5,500 students want representation on the bodies that decide whether teachers are hired or promoted. And over 4,000 of those who voted want parity. (There were about 22,000 students eligible to vote.)

Perhaps Ivey and other elitist inclined faculty members now have a reasonable idea of what some of us think of his brand of education. Ivey and his like are also going to be in the forefront of any student versus faculty and administration confrontation over the issue. Ivey sees the university "as an elitist institution". As he remarked Monday night, "It has to be." Well perhaps now we'll deal with that question.

Almost 25 per cent of the undergraduate students on the campus at the U of T are dissatisfied enough that they want to see some student representation on staffing committees. They are likely fed up with poor teaching and feel professors should get jobs at this university on criteria involving other standards than that of research.

The second highest total came in the athletics question. It now should be obvious to the university administration that the proof they wanted to see has been furnished. And the expected anti-combined Directorate vote by women didn't appear.

The debate on the future of athletics at this campus is about to begin in the Internal Affairs Committee of the Governing Council next week and the referendum vote is a sure indication that those who pay for athletics on this campus want a controlling say in how the program is run. After all students have this right in other institutions in the province. And although athletic directorate member Don Ivey doesn't feel strongly about the issue, 6,000 undergrads have shown in the last two days that they do.

As SAC president Anderson said last night, "I don't think the university can refuse" students a say in their athletic governing structure. And if they do? Well Anderson wouldn't say, but there's always lots of room for basketball practice in the halls of Simcoe Hall. Anyway the discipline code doesn't come into effect until January.

And SAC finally saw its participation in the National Union of Students. Even before the final vote was counted SAC president Anderson was winging his way west to the NUS annual conference in Edmonton with (it's rumoured) a suitcase full of ballots to impress his counterparts on the national student political scene.

Seriously though, U of T's support will mean a much stronger National Union of Students and a chance at some nation "student movement building" again after a dry four years.

Although the final results weren't tabulated late last night it's obvious that SAC's referendum spells a positive direction for the campus and perhaps a turning point in student politics at U of T. Apathy doesn't reign supreme after all. Thanks for supporting the referendum, people.

IMPROVING!

Business Briefs

With this issue we're reviving an old Varsity policy of bringing you the best in corporate news. (But since it's a somewhat opinionated news blurb we thought we'd best place it strategically on our editorial page.) So here goes.

Fairview Corporation of Canada Ltd., Toronto, has started construction of its $20 million Hillcrest Mall shopping centre in Richmond Hill. Completion of this one-stop shopping marvel with 652,000 square feet of consumer comfort is set for next August. Those of you who have had the opportunity to glance at our pages over the past little while (or even our rival's pages - for example page 5 of today's Globe and Mail) will remember Fairview as that nice wrecking ball company that has (yesterday) succeeded in wresting control of Naomi Bilton's will to U of T Reitman's store. Part of the giant tentacle - forming Seagram - Distillers, Fairview's goal, it's rumoured is to put up a shopping centre on every block in Canada by 1990. Don't try our corner fellows.

You can never really get away from home if you happen to be a resident of the giant to our south and once again the Great American Dream is coming true for those friendly folks in Thailand. (Remember there the one's with the north-east corner of their country bombed to bits by friendly American planes.) And now to make US servicemen's time even easier Holiday Inns of (you guessed it) America - Memphis, Tennessee, to be precise - are planning to build three hotels in Thailand within three years. Due to go up in Bangkok, northern Chiang Mai and southern Uket the rooms are rumoured to have a scenic view of Commie troops "comin' over the hill" singing a tune containing the once-popular lyrics of "Dominoe." Just sit back and watch the flak fly fellow-travellers and not-so-fellow-travellers.

Labatt's Breweries of Canada Ltd. the people with the smooth beer and rough politics (they're owned by the Canadian multi-national, Brascan which is heavily involved in "developing" Brazil) is going to stay with its nostalgic "coming home" theme in next year's advertising. The company's national ad manager Art Lennox claims: "We feel the nostalgia theme has yet to run its course." The aim is to project "a pleasant, warm association" with people returning home from work, or from abroad," he said. Too bad the friendly nostalgic Brascan folks don't come home from Brazil.

Créditiste party still rural rump

adapted from QUÉBEC-PRESSE

The old Ralliement Créditiste party led by Camil Samson became the Créditiste Party (PC) under Yvon Dupuis largely through the generation of a considerable amount of publicity and excitement. Its new image was expressed largely through its leader, Dupuis. Yet, contrary to Dupuis' optimistic expectations, there's a great risk that all the commotion concerning his new party will really prove to be little more than empty gestures at the polls.

And on the day after the Quebec provincial election (October 29) the PC will likely find itself once again represented by members of the National Assembly from northwest Quebec (from l'Estrie in particular).

In fact the election results were to go in that direction Dupuis' future in the PC would be exceedingly tenuous. One can predict that Camil Samson is watching close by the performance of his sole major opponent within the party, and should Dupuis falter Samson will again attempt to become the predominant force that he once was in the provincial party. The split in the party, which observers had predicted would follow Dupuis' election as leader, would then probably become a reality.

Dupuis claims at every opportunity that the principal game at stake for his party in the election is for the PC "to take power". But he isn't seriously considering forming the government. Neither are the party loyalists making isolated attacks on the Parti Québécois; the plan is instead to eliminate the Union Nationale from the Quebec countryside and therefore become the third political force in Quebec.

Dupuis' goal as head of the PC

For party leader Yvon Dupuis there is still another important risk at stake in the upcoming elections: proving that his nomination as leader of the Créditistes was a good decision. While this may prove to be true, Dupuis' task is to move the party's base of support and its image away from its habitual grounds of the rural "medieval citadels" and make advances into the large metropolitan regions. That was the real purpose of the political strategists, who as they had done once before with René Caouette, determined Dupuis' election as leader of the party.

But Dupuis' political background is suspect. His trouble with the law in 1953 and then again in 1966 provide him and his political opponents with serious issues.

Unless Dupuis quickly modifies his campaign tone, there's little chance that he'll succeed in gaining any support from the urban electors in the Montreal region, with the exception perhaps of certain isolated pockets.

(However, the PQ seems to be well-entrenched in any of the possible PC "swing" Montreal ridings.)

The PC's simplistic demagoguery concerning social security, or the extremist-like hunt for socialism will, without much doubt, produce certain pro-PC effects in the rural township ridings, but there's no certainty that these underlying rural currents exist for Dupuis' party in the heart of the urban social strata which the PC is seeking to win over.

The Créditistes' "program"

Each of the PC platform's measures proposed is then accompanied by a restriction of some sort, and usually the progressive sections of the document are counterbalanced by reactionary tendencies. In other words the platform is so vague in its orientation as to be essentially meaningless. The party is trying to serve two masters at the same time—the mass population on the one hand, and the wealthy financial milieu on the other.

The electoral program in general is strikingly ambiguous for a "populist" political formation which desires to rally "the little people" around measures reflecting deeply human measures. But the party is paralyzed by a conservative ideology of the extreme right which finally destroys anything progressive about it before it's had a chance to implement any beneficial policies.

In the area of cultural affairs, for example, the platform proposes measures for facilitating to every one "the accessibility to culture", without clarifying the actual means to accomplish the goals. In other words, it's a little glib. And in the same sphere, a Créditiste government would take "all necessary measures to assure the safeguarding of our historical inheritance." It also memories of past Créditiste policy, but in fact the word "divident" is almost all that's left of the economic system proposed in the early 1920's by the Social Credit party in the rest of Canada...

Many proposals emphasized by the PC in this chapter of its platform—most notably those sections dealing with work, education, or culture—should not be ignored. At the same time their value is sometimes almost meaningless because of the not-too-promising restrictions to the measures.

Ideological intolerance

So, in labour relations, for example, the PC recognizes the right to strike and the principle of trade unionism; the Créditistes even go so far as to favour the participation of the worker in the workplace and in the overall direction of the business operation.

In the same breath the document adds that a Créditiste government "will insert into the code of labour the necessary regulations" so that a strike could be declared legal, and to assure that the workers are "well-informed in meetings where they could express predisposition toward authoritarian, ideological intolerance and a desire to control and oversee directly both students and teachers.

Even the slogan which serves as the heading for the section of the policy concerning education says, "One must make sure that teachers teach and students study in our schools." And to achieve this goal the PC outlines some sweeping directions it would like to move in if elected: decentralization of the structure of the ministry of education, humanizing the schools by reducing the number of pupils to 1,000 per school, reform of the CEGEPS (the midway schools between high school and university, combining both liberal arts and technical streams), and the participation of parents, professors and students in establishing and furthering any internal school policies.

A "law and order" party

Following the section of the platform dealing with education the PC document moves on to deal with several specific and sharp points of "law and order". For example, the PC would forbid professors to put forward their own "ideological" viewpoints in the class rooms, there would be a return to "order and discipline" in the schools, the withdrawal of teachers believed to be harmful to educational goals, and orderly educational regimentation of "Quebec's young girls and boys" in centres of physical and civic formation in a fashion reminiscent of fascist countries. But rest assured that the PC takes the precaution of affirming that attendance at these centres will not be compulsory. However historical experience demonstrates that, all the same, in this area "choice" quickly becomes "obligation".

With regard to economic policy, the Créditiste manifesto is founded on a conservative philosophy not dissimilar to the Union Nationale's. The policy proposes open denunciation and removal of all socialist enterprises, or all those which appear to be socialist, compounded with enthusiasm and support for a free enterprise regime.

A Dupuis-led government would favour "private investment above all else". It would safeguard and encourage "the private sector of business with the recognized advantages of the public sector". Yet another non-committal statement. Moreover, were the PC to gain power, it would sanction, through adequate legislation, "the place of private enterprise in the network of the distribution of healthcare". This means, in effect, a partial return to private medicine.

Constitutional affairs

The constitutional question only slightly affects the Créditistes. The PC program is, in fact, so content with the subject that it fails to write anything original, choosing instead to plagiarize the other parties' programs. But to continue on with the other provinces in an amiable federal system it feels a need for a new constitution, a presidential regime for Quebec, a referendum on independence, and the repeal of Bill 63. (Passed in 1969, Bill 63 gives parents freedom of choice for the language in which their children are educated.)

Authoritarian in nature

What the PC program seems to add up to, in effect, is the cult of a strong man with a populist style and an extremely conservative platform. The platform's provision for the election of six members to represent the professional groups specifically is an example of "corporatism" which takes its roots from political institutions with their foundations in fascist countries.

The Créditiste party is a phenomenon caused in part by extremely rapid social change in Quebec—the party stems from the largely rural, discontented voter who has seen his society obliterated in the past 15 years and technology impose a new imprint on the province. The PC has rapidly formed a magnet for the many indigenous farmers and other classes displaced by rapid social change. They represent the "squeezed out" minorities of the social system, minorities which are desperately attempting to pull the province back toward its former life style.

YVON

proposes "financial aid to organizations and enterprises which favour the development of Quebecois talents..."

A demagogic populist

Yvon Dupuis' program doesn't spare any aspect in the policy area of social security either. It injects into the overall program piecemeal measures such as a guaranteed annual income as well as bonuses to mothers who stay at home with their children, and vacation payments of $100 per year for mothers of a child above the regular school age. There's also a lottery subsidy for everyone: students, working poor, handicapped people, and needy senior citizens. The proposals bring back opinions concerning whether or not to hold a strike. The statement can also be seen as the open door to arbitrary government intervention, depending on the pressure groups involved and their influence with the PC.

As for education, the PC makes a "great to do about nothing" in its suggestion to change the name of the Ministry of Education to the Ministry of Education and Instruction. It recognizes that modifications have to be made in the students' scholarship system, but fails to define which changes and doesn't even touch how any changes would be brought into effect. The PC electoral platform then goes into a series of proposals which, under a seemingly reformist guise, badly conceals exploitation of sex.

Immigration ban labelled unfair

At midnight 15 October the 60 day grace period for illegal immigrants living in Canada expired. After the grace period such persons will no longer be able to apply for landed immigrant status and will be subject to summary deportation.

We feel that there are still many Americans and other non-immigrants in Canada who would apply, but have not been aware of the grace period. Often people living underground are difficult to reach with such information, let alone to convince of government sincerity. Government estimates of illegal immigrants ranged from 50,000 to 200,000; however, fewer than 50,000 came forward to register with immigration officials. We urge the Government to extend the immigration grace period so that many thousands who have yet to register can do so.

Although an extension of the grace period is crucial, it does not fully solve the problems of many potential immigrants. Now that it is again no longer possible to apply for landed immigrant status within Canada, but only from the country of one's origin, Canada has been cut off as a place of refuge for persons seeking to escape prosecution and other types of repression due to their opposition to political or military policies in their home country.

This problem does not only concern Americans who have resisted US policies in Indochina, but also Greeks, Chileans, Portuguese, Vietnamese, and Haitians, to name a few groups, who have opposed oppressive policies in their respective countries. Many such refugees did not come forward during the immigration grace period due to unawareness of the opportunity or for fear of being rejected and deported to the jails and stockades of their homeland. An extension could help many of them.

But what about future immigration policies? Will Canada be closed to such people? The solution to this larger problem is the granting of refugee status to persons fleeing political oppression.

Israel's guilty of imperialism

Congratulations for the excellent article War in the East of October 12, 1973. May I add that the present tragic war in the Middle East directly arises from continued Israeli occupation of Arab lands for the past six years in defiance of United Nations Resolutions, and its refusal to recognize the rights of the Palestinians. This basic injustice is still ignored by the Israelis who stated instead that they intend "to teach the Arabs a lesson" by totally destroying their armies and by occupying their territory.

The road to peace in the Middle East is not annexation of the territory of the Arab peoples; each buffer zone soon becomes a part of what is accepted as national territory. Then you need another buffer zone. Rather, justice must come to the Palestinians, occupied territories must be handed back, and a secular and democratic Middle East Federation of the Arab and Israeli peoples be established.

Communists like throaty "dames"

I'm surprised The Varsity hasn't received another letter from the Communist Club, this time about the arrest of one of its members, Dave Galbraith, for showing "Deep Throat".

"Starvin' " Galbraith would have really made the show if he could have persuaded Leonid Brezhnev to open the show with the line he gave Nixon last year: "There's nothing like a dame".

This is nothing new for the CP. Their own Eveready Printers thrived for years publishing the well known paper "Flash".

At a time when increasing numbers of students and workers see the urgency of fighting the oppression of women, the revisionists rush to get in line with capitalists in the Deep Throat didn't give reviewer an erection

A few notes concerning Deep Throat:

1. I didn't get off, didn't even inch towards erection. On the other hand I wasn't nauseated as two persons I know who saw it (both women) said they were. I was uncomfortable from time to time at sex divorced from beauty. (Note: I am complaining about sex without beauty, not sex without love. I'm no prude.) There may have been carnality in Deep Throat, but if there was, it didn't turn me on. I suspect it wasn't carnal, just anatomical.

2. Some people have drawn equations between porn and movies like A Clockwork Orange or Last Tango in Paris. Some seem to think that the baby-baby-blue movies on channel 79 are farther down the spectrum than they are. Let's be clear about the difference. Deep Throat showed: glans, prepuce, bulbi cavernosi, scrotum, mons veneris, labia majora and minora, the clitoral hood and the vaginal entrance; congress (various entries), fellatio, cunnilingus, anal intercourse and coitus interruptus, revealing ejaculation and semen. (I am curious as to whether this was at the request of the director or the actresses.)

I recall a psychiatrist friend once saying that few women knew much about their own sexual anatomy and that most had never thoroughly examined themselves. If one accepts the notion that learning can occur at the convenience of the instructor, then Deep Throat could be instructional. However it is an illiberal notion and an illiberal movie, divorcing the part from the whole.

3. David Cooper, the British psychiatrist and social critic, one remarked that he could go through a room and point out which persons were "the product of orgasmic fuck, and which were the product of merely rutting." The trouble with Deep Throat was not so much the rutting as the merelessness.

4. Social notes: Evidently one of the students who was arrested for showing the movie is a medical student. He was asked by the arresting officer if he had found anything educational in the film. He said that he had not, realized previously that control of the upper level of the oesophagus was voluntary.

Leon Redbone, playing in concert across the street at Convocation Hall came over to see the movie after he finished his set. He was easily distinguishable by his tuxedo.

The three plain-clothes policemen who watched the show were noticed too, but were not suspected by the exhibitors because "they looked too much like cops to be undercover".

Linda Lovelace, star of Deep Throat, has had her teeth straightened since the film.

5. Are there persons who were aroused by Deep Throat? I confess to being moved by pornography, but always where it is suggestive. To me, books are the most effective porn medium for that reason. I once saw a very arousing trailer for a porno film, and it has crossed my mind periodically ever since. There was to be some ritual involving an egg, but I never found out what. It didn't appear that it was going to be the obvious, and though I have raked my mind since, I have never satisfied myself about that egg.

6. Some eighteen hundred people came to Deep Throat despite a tiny expenditure on advertising, reminding me of a story Wilfred Pelletier, an Ojibwa, tells about walking down Yonge St. with Ernest Tootoosis, a Cree. Ernest told Wilf he heard a cricket. Wilf could hear nothing over the din of the traffic. Tootoosis took him down the street to a fruit stand, stopped, listened, picked up a basket and there was the cricket. "How could you hear it?" Wilf asked. Ernest took a dime from his pocket and dropped it on the sidewalk. People from twenty yards away looked around. "We hear". Ernest said, "what we listen for".

7. My companion and I left before the end of the film, bored and rather put off sex.

8. I've forgotten who, but someone said to me that, like art, pornography had the power to move its audience, but porn worked directly on the genitals. Art worked on the head and heart as well.

Why bother with this book?

The Failure of Educational Reform in Canada
ed. by Douglas Myers McLelland and Stewart

Education is the last hope of the liberal, as Edmund Wilson put it, and as Douglas Myers reminds us in his introduction to a collection of articles reprinted from the Canadian Forum entitled The Failure of Educational Reform in Canada.

What then are we to think when the major growth sector of the 1960's no longer seems to be the answer for every problem modern society faces? Indeed, increasingly the school system is attacked as being a major force in perpetuating those very inequities which it was supposed to eliminate. The obvious answer to this dilemma is to solicit contributions from selected educators, and publish them in a certain distinguished liberal magazine — Lament for Education.

Surprisingly, there are a number of good articles in the collection. Especially good is the first article ("Class, Bureaucracy and Schools") by one of the most perceptive writers on education, Michael Katz, formerly of OISE.

To be noted also is a very thought-provoking short preface by John Bremer, Commissioner of Education for B.C. (and at one time almost appointed as head of the Toronto Board of Education).

The theme of the book is summed up by the title of one of the articles, "Who Killed the Goose?"

One wonders why a separately published volume was considered necessary. If you can get hold of a copy of the appropriate issue of Canadian Forum, you might find something of interest in the collection, but hardly worth purchasing the book. all chilton

CALL FOR 'LABATT'S BLUE'

Now our movies are as good (and bad) as anyone else's

By reviewing four Canadian movies this week, I reveal my bad faith. It's a protectionist stance, pre-supposing inferior goods. Though that may have been justified as recently as a year ago, Canadian movies are now at par with the rest of the world's. We have a masterpiece Mon Oncle Antoine, several sleepers, one of them Between Friends, some serious films of interest if not lasting appeal, like Kamouraska, some competent genre work The Pyx, some flops that still hold out a bit of promise Paperback Hero, and a small pile of crap. We have a lower output than the big movie powers, but we are normally proportioned. Artistically, protection is not needed.

(It is still needed politically and financially: support your local film-maker, he is one of the guardians of your inheritance. While I don't believe in a national anything, I do believe we have regional particularities, buffeted as they are by the imperial media. If national support will help keep Southern Ontario out of the hands of California and New York, then national support is called for.)

Harvey Hart's The Pyx benefits most by its Canadian-ness (Montrealness, in this case), despite its multi-national ambition and little over concern for its province of origin. A big city cop is investigating the murder of a call girl, his first clues being some religious, or perhaps blasphemous articles found on the body. It is plain to see how the movie got financed: there's a bit of Kluge, a bit of Rosemary's Baby, a bit of French Connection — something to hedge the bets of the most reluctant investor. But while The Pyx is derivative and while its climax is pretty hoaky, there is a nice pace and an élan that makes the time in the theatre enjoyably enough spent.

Much of the credit must go to Karen Black as the hooker and Christopher Plummer as the cop. Both give a sense of accuracy. Plummer's cop is not the particularly individual and violent one of the current style or the super-sleuth of a few years back. He's a good plodding investigator who figures he's doing something for the city. Karen Black's strung-out, scattered call girl is surely more real than Jane Fonda's, although one misses the dash and wit of Fonda's portrayal, misleading for a whore but so revealing of an upper middle class actress. There is also a lovely little cameo of a vaguely illegal concierge played by Montreal actor Robin Gammell in a style slightly reminiscent of Arnold Stang.

However, the real heroine and the real redeemer of The Pyx is Montreal. Betty Lee, the Globe's film critic wrote that the movie could have taken place anywhere. But, she couldn't be more wrong. Take away Montreal's seedy catholicism and all The Pyx's concern with religion, sex and death would be just contrivance. In Montreal, it holds because it is so close to the nerve of the city. Hart's decision to retain Montreal's bilingualism gives the film an ambience the dialogue alone could never have sustained. Here there is always a slight strain when strangers talk, a hint of relief if they both turn out to understand one another. There is an ever-present sense of minute daily dislocation, of working cheek by jowl with someone whose apparatus has been differently turned since birth. Montreal does for The Pyx what reverber does for a good pop record.

Though I don't share their enthusiasm, I can see why people are so taken by Kamouraska. It is thick with virtues. Genevieve Bujold's is a performance of classical dimension. At the beginning of the film she is sitting death watch for her second husband. She is exhausted with serving him and, in her tiredness and concern (more for propriety than for the man), she recalls her history from girlhood and her glowing debut at a Governor-General's ball. From there we pursue her tragic affairs of the heart: she has an arranged marriage to a young seigneur who turns out, behind catholic and aristocratic discretion, to be a drunken bully. Recalling from him she falls in love with a dark and passionate young doctor, emigrated to Quebec in some mystery. They plot to murder her husband. She endures trial and imprisonment and is released to rehabilitation and respectability in a second loveless, but serviceable marriage.

Bujold manages it all nothing short of brilliantly. It has been hard to credit her as the great actress she is because she is so pretty (and because her ears stick out). She still looks like the everyman's fancy she played in King of Hearts. But she is our one great international movie star and for Kamouraska she has mustered her deepest and richest performance.

There are other virtues in Kamouraska. It is beautiful to watch. Its winterscapes are broad and exciting. And such are the skills of director Jutra and photographer Brault that these winters are wholly different from the winter of Mon Oncle Antoine. Kamouraska lacks the social impact of Jutra's masterpiece, set as it is, 100 years earlier. With Antoine, we could feel our part in the displacement visited on the characters of the small Quebec town. We don't have that connection to Kamouraska, though it rings with a historical connection to us: the colonial upliftiness, the squareness decked out as virtue have been handed down directly from the good patrons of Jutra's endless balls and soirees. There is a nice resonance in the absurd formality of the dancing. The scenes are far, far distant, but they feel right.

But for all that, Kamouraska wore on me before its two hours were up, because, though it is billed as the nation's great love story, I could never quite track down the love, only the proclamations. The great love of the ads refers to the kind of passion found in the Brontës or in Hardy — exciting stuff, but not much like mine. Only Bujold's character is thoroughly enough drawn to make sense of the tears, sighs and blood. The rest of the time I just wasn't convinced. The lover was unfathomable, now a doctor, now a murderer. Why? tant one. He is still our master film-maker, nourished their love? I couldn't help remembering Rosalie Sorrell's remark that the lady who leaves her house and land for the gypsy not only winds up sleeping on the cold, cold ground, but soon discovers he is as big a pig as the lord she left with the linen. As for the husband, he is so irredeemably evil that it hardly matters that he is murdered, except to the law. Everyone else is pretty pleased to be rid of him. The impact of the killing shrinks accordingly.

These are not the sort of questions that one traditionally asks of gothic romance, so perhaps it is unfair to start with Kamouraska. The film does what it does well enough, but it might have done more. To be great at such a vast and foreign enterprise, Kamouraska would have to be not Canada's Gone With the Wind, but our Les Enfants du Paradis. Films of that grandeur and depth can be numbered on a hand (come to think of it, perhaps on a finger) so Jutra's failure is not an important one. He is still our master film-maker.
